

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

OU_166623

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

OUP--556--13-7-71--4,000.

OSMANIA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

Call No. 82.1.17

Accession No. ⁸⁹9737

Author

Chaucer

Title

The Man's Priest's Tale

This book should be returned on or before the date last marked below.

THE CHASE. *Misericords from 1. Ely Cathedral (14th cent.);
2. Boston, Lincs. (late 14th cent.); 3. Beverley Minster (early 16th cent.)*

CHAUCER

The Nun's Priest's Tale

EDITED BY

KENNETH SISAM

O X F O R D

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
AMEN HOUSE, E.C. 4
London Edinburgh Glasgow New York
Toronto Melbourne Capetown Bombay Calcutta Madras
HUMPHREY MILFORD
PUBLISHER TO THE UNIVERSITY

FIRST PUBLISHED 1927 ⁵
REPRINTED 1930, 1933
1938, 1940

 PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN AT THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, OXFORD
BY JOHN JOHNSON, PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY

PREFACE

IN preparing this edition I have had in mind the needs of schools and colleges who keep up the good practice of studying a few short texts minutely, and of including The Nun's Priest's Tale among them. As not many users of the edition will come to it with a grounding in medieval literature, or with an adequate library at hand, it seemed best to give a minimum of references to books and articles, and to include a good deal of elementary matter which those who do not need it may pass over.

The notes of Tyrwhitt, Skeat, and Mr. Pollard (in his separate edition) have eased the way for commentators on this tale; and Mr. Griffith's Bibliography of Chaucer 1908-1924 (Washington 1926) has been my guide to some recent articles. Mere difficulty of access has prevented me from using Miss Petersen's thorough study of the sources as much as I could have wished, but I have gone over again points of difference in the results.

For help in obtaining the illustrations from carvings, I am obliged to the authorities at Beverley Minster, Boston (Lincs.), Carlisle, and Ely, and to the photographers, the Rev. W. E. Wigfall, and Messrs. G. E. Hackford, F. W. Tassall, and G. H. Tyndall. Canon Christopher Wordsworth very kindly gave me an account of the early fox carvings in the Chapter House at Salisbury, but they were much broken before restoration, and they throw no light on our story.

K. S.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
PREFACE	v
INTRODUCTION	vii
TEXT	i
NOTES	25
LANGUAGE AND METRE	61
GLOSSARY	70

ILLUSTRATIONS

A Canterbury pilgrim's sign with the head of St. Thomas	cover
Misericords showing the Chase	frontispiece

(1) From Ely : left support, a Fox preaches to a Cock and Geese ; centre, Woman with distaff pursues Fox, who is carrying a Cock (?) on his back. (2) From Boston, Lines. : the captured bird appears to be a Goose. (3) From Beverley Minster : left support, two Foxes conspiring ; centre, Woman with distaff comes out of her cottage to pursue a Fox who has a Goose on his back ; right support, Fox holding the Goose.

Marie of France reading her poems. Note the study furniture (MS. Vatican Ottob. 3064, fourteenth century)	xii
Reynard and Tiecekin, the Cheese falling (MS. Douce 360, fourteenth century)	xviii
The Chase—the Cock has escaped (MS. Douce 360)	xxi
The Pilgrims' Way to Canterbury	xxxvi
Chaucer on Pilgrimage (Ellesmere MS.)	xxxix
The Monk with a Hound (Ellesmere MS.)	i
The Knight (Ellesmere MS.)	3
The Nun's Priest (Ellesmere MS.)	5
The Beginning of the Prologue to the Tale in the Ellesmere MS.	24
Misericord from Carlisle Cathedral (early fifteenth century)	tailpiece

INTRODUCTION

I. THE BEAST FABLE.

STORIES of animals are found in every corner of Europe and Asia. From Africa negro slaves brought the matter of Uncle Remus to the American plantations; and in the remote South Seas, where the more genial four-footed beasts were unknown, the natives found entertainment in the colloquies of a lizard and a codfish. Nor is their appeal limited to children and simple folk; for Goethe retold the story of Reynard the Fox,¹ and Socrates occupied his last days in versifying the fables of Aesop.

The literary pedigree of the Nun's Priest's Tale begins with this Aesop, a Phrygian slave of the sixth century B.C. But the Greek fables that pass under his name are a miscellaneous collection of much later date, and they have little of the freshness one would expect from his legendary reputation. The fact is that Aesop's Fables became a school-book. They were revised, supplemented, versified, and translated by many imitators, some nameless, and some like Phaedrus, Babrius and Avianus, who are little more than names. Generations of schoolboys did exercises on them, retold them in prose, or turned them into verse; and it is no wonder they became trite with hard use. Anyhow, one of the best known of Aesop's Fables² gives us a starting-point, though it must not be supposed that Chaucer's story derives from it in the direct line: we can only note the historical outcroppings of a theme whose main development is beyond the reach of records:

¹ Reineke Fuchs, 1794.

² In the edition of the Aesopic Fables by A. Chambry, Paris 1926, texts of this fable are given at pp. 285-7. It is referred to by Horace, Satires ii. v. 56; and it is the second fable of La Fontaine.

A Crow sitting in a tree and eating a piece of meat ('cheese' in another version) is approached by a hungry Fox, who praises its plumage and declares that it would be the first among birds if only it could sing. The Crow, much flattered, opens its beak to sing and drops the morsel, which the Fox snaps up.

This may seem remote from the tale of the Cock and the Fox, but the analogy becomes clearer when Chaucer's story is reduced to its framework of two similar tricks: (i) The Fox flatters the Cock into singing with eyes shut, so that he is caught; and (ii) the Cock flatters his captor into shouting back at the pursuers, and escapes as the Fox opens his mouth.¹

In Western Europe Greek books were closed books throughout the Middle Ages, and Aesop's Fables were known chiefly through the medium of two Latin versifiers: Phaedrus, 'the freedman of Augustus', who wrote in the first century A. D., and Avianus, who belongs perhaps to the fourth century A. D.² For a time their collections were preserved by the lingering tradition of the Roman schools; but they took on a new life in the eighth century, when Charles the Great gave his support to a revival of letters. The spirit of this revival (which was undertaken less for the sake of the classics themselves than as a necessary preliminary to the study of the Bible and the Fathers) fostered the development of fables. If they were useful in the teaching of Latin, they were still more useful for the teaching of moral lessons; and from this time onwards the 'moral', which is implied rather than expressed in the classical fables, became more and more prominent.

¹ The attempt to connect our story with Aesop's fable of the Cock, Dog, and Fox is a failure. There is no historical contact, because this particular fable is omitted from the medieval collections; and the stories are radically unlike. It explains nothing to say that Aesop's Dog, who is the Cock's guardian and kills the Fox, develops into 'Colle our dogge, and Talbot and Gerland', who join a quite ineffective chase. Any farmyard cur would do that without needing an example in classical antiquity.

² Both edited, with their Latin derivatives, by L. Hervieux, Les Fabulistes Latins, 5 vols., Paris 1893-9.

It so happens that while Avianus does not approach our story, and Phaedrus is content to hand on the fable of the Crow and the Fox, Alcuin of York (d. 804), who was Charles's right hand, carries us a step forward in his Latin verses on the Cock and the Wolf.¹

A Cock, who ventures too far when looking for food, is caught by a Wolf. With great presence of mind, he mentions the report he has heard of the Wolf's wonderful voice, and says he does not mind being eaten so much as losing the chance of verifying this report. The Wolf opens wide his jaws to show off his voice, and the Cock, escaping to a high branch, chides him for his folly in shouting before he has dined.

This is, in essentials, the second trick.

Soon after Alcuin's time, Latin prose renderings of Phaedrus's verse eclipsed their original. By far the most influential of these is attributed to a shadowy Romulus, who is sometimes dignified by the title of 'Emperor', though his empire does not extend beyond the realm of fable. This collection, made perhaps in the ninth century, and undergoing many modifications in the course of time, plays the chief part in the spread of fables during the later Middle Ages. But its direct contribution to our story is slight, for the early form of Romulus² seems to contain nothing more apposite than Phaedrus's version of the Crow and the Fox.

Another Latin prose version is more helpful. In

¹ Ed. Dümmler, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae Aevi Carolini i, p. 262.

² Several versions are printed and compared by Hervieux, Les Fabulistes Latins, vols. i and ii.

1034 Adhemar, a monk of the Abbey of St. Martial at Limoges, died in Jerusalem, whither he had gone some years before. One of the books he left behind at the Abbey included a collection of fables copied with his own hand, and it is now MS. Vossianus Latinus 8vo, no. 15 in the Leyden Library. This collection¹ consists in the main of crude adaptations from Phaedrus, among which is the Crow and the Fox. But it contains some fables found neither in Phaedrus nor in any other ancient source, and to this group belongs the Fox and the Partridge :

A Fox came up to a Partridge on her perch and said 'How beautiful are your face, your legs, your coral beak! Yet you would look more beautiful still in your sleep.' The Partridge closed her eyes, and the Fox promptly seized her. The Partridge then implores the Fox to pronounce her name once more before he eats her, and when he opens his mouth to say 'Partridge', she escapes. 'Alas!' says the Fox, 'what need had I to speak?' 'Alas!' replies the Partridge, 'what need had I to close my eyes when I wasn't sleepy'.

How Adhemar came by this story we do not know. But here is the eye-shutting trick played by a fox on a bird, together with the mouth-opening trick by which the tables are turned; and the combination of old motives must have taken place before the year 1029, when Adhemar set out for the Holy Land.

The next record shows an advance in story-telling. The Brussels MS. 10708, fol. 172² contains, in a hand that seems to be of the second half of the twelfth century, the Latin poem Gallus et Vulpes,³ which was probably composed earlier in the same century :

A hungry Fox finds a Cock crowing on his dunghill and too

¹ Ed. Hervieux, ii, p. 142.

² I owe the identification of this MS. to the courtesy of the director of the Bibliothèque Royale, M. Paris.

³ Printed in Lateinische Gedichte des X. und XI. Jh., ed. J. Grimm and A. Schmeller, Göttingen 1838, p. 345 ff.

vigilant to be caught. So he tries flattery. 'Your father used to dance as he crew—perhaps you can't do that?' The Cock comes nearer, crowing and dancing giddily. 'Why', he asks, should I be thought a degenerate son?' 'Wonderful!' replies the Fox: 'your father lives again in you. But he used to shut his right eye.' 'I do the same', says the Cock, and adds that to his performance. The Fox falls flat, overcome with admiration. 'Who could believe it? You would even excel him if you shut both eyes.' The Cock does it, and is caught. Neighbours begin the chase, crying 'The Fox has got the Cock! Help, or the paragon of birds will perish!' The Fox is well away, when the Cock has a plan: 'Let my death be honourable. The pursuers say you have stolen me, and don't recognize your marvellous wit. Put me down and say "I am taking what is my own, not yours". Then I shall die happy.' The Fox carries out the suggestion and the Cock flies away. 'A plague on the unruly tongue!' cries the Fox. 'And a plague on the eyes that shut when they should see', says the Cock. A long religious interpretation follows.

To reach English soil we must leave Latin behind and follow the fable into vernacular literature. Towards the end of the twelfth century, Marie of France, who was one of the brilliant group of writers attached to the court of Henry II, wrote in French verse an Ysopet ('little Aesop') or collection of fables, which includes the following:¹

My tale is of a Cock who stood on a dunghill and crew. A Fox came by and addressed him with smooth words: 'Sir,' he said, 'how handsome you are! I never saw so fine a bird! Your voice is surpassingly clear, and no bird ever sang better—saving your father whom I knew; but he crew better still because he shut his eyes.' 'I can do that,' says the Cock. He beats his wings and shuts his eyes tightly, thinking to crow more clarion clear. The Fox made a spring, seized him, and ran off towards the wood. The shepherds chased him across a field; the dogs barked all about him. 'There goes the Fox,' they cry, 'he has the Cock!' 'Come,' says the Cock, 'shout back to them that I am yours and you won't let me go.' The Fox tried to shout his loudest, and the Cock, slipping from his mouth, flew into a high tree. The Fox, in his rage, began to curse the mouth that speaks when it should be still. 'And I', replied the Cock, 'have cause to curse the eye that winks when it should keep watch and ward against harm that may come upon its master.'

¹ Die Fabeln der Marie de France, ed. Karl Warnke (Bibliotheca Normannica), Halle 1898, p. 198 ff.

In her Prologue Marie mentions 'Romulus the Emperor', and most of her stories come from Romulus, Marie of France reading her poems.

though this particular one does not.¹ In an Epilogue she gives a more circumstantial account of her sources: Aesop translated the fables from Greek into Latin; King Alfred, who liked them well, turned them into English; and Marie herself turned them from English into French verse. Now it is as certain that King Alfred did not translate the fables into English as that Aesop did not translate them into Latin.² But ¹ It occurs in the 'Anglo-Latin Romulus' (Hervieux, ii, p. 598); but there it appears to be derived from Marie.

² In the twelfth century Alfred's reputation for wisdom stood high, and another popular compilation of the time, the 'Proverbs of Alfred', is attributed to him on no better grounds.

Marie's testimony carries more weight when she says she translated from English. Either this is mere literary mystification (improbable, though not impossible in the century of Geoffrey of Monmouth) or there was once a fable collection in English which has been wholly lost. And as there is slight internal evidence in support of Marie's statement, the latter alternative should be preferred.¹ Did this English version contain our story as it appears in Marie? We do not know, and even if we could prove that it did, we should not be much the wiser. The source of the details in her version, and in Gallus et Vulpes before it, seems to be the story of Reynard the Fox as it grew up in France during the twelfth century.

II. REYNARD THE FOX.

The twelfth century stands out as a lively and creative age in Western Europe, whether it is judged by great movements (such as the rise of a new architecture, of universities, of a multitude of new literary forms and kinds in the vernacular) or by its results in some tiny detail, as when it gives new life to the dry bones of a fable that had been chewed unprofitably for centuries before. What happy combination of circumstances unlocked this abounding vitality it is impossible to say. But one aspect is suggested by the history we have just traced. Preceding ages had always before them the model of Rome in her days of greatness. Those who cared for literature imitated the Latin classics; and by using a dead language and the forms and subjects of a past civilization, they cut themselves off from the mass of the people. Once it was realized that an author could express the things that interested his contemporaries in his own language and in the forms that suited it, expression led with amazing swiftness to fuller and better expression. A literature arose that was popular in the sense that the whole people—nobles, clergy, traders, artisans, peasants—could share in it ; for while works (other than learned works) circulated orally rather than by the medium of books, inability to read was not a bar to the enjoyment of poetry, and inability to write did not prevent a man who had something worth telling from adding it to the common stock.

¹ See a valuable article by E. Mall in Zeitschrift für romanische Philologie, vol. ix.

There is a change, too, in the purpose of authors. For many centuries the view of the Church that literature should instruct had prevailed against the example of the classics ; but now, with the growth of a minstrel class who lived by catering for the varied tastes of the people, a considerable number of works appear which have no other object than entertainment.

One more change concerns us closely : a new interest in natural things, particularly in birds and animals, is a sign of the break with the past. Granted that they fell far short of modern precision and range of observation, that they soon relapsed into convention, and that their curiosity was easily satisfied by absurdities such as those reported in Physiologus and the derived Bestiaries ; still writers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries give ample evidence of a fresh and sympathetic outlook on nature, which finds expression too in painting and the ornaments of architecture.

These are some of the conditions under which the cycle of animal stories grew up that bears the name of Reynard the Fox, its principal character ; and they are not satisfied by the old fables in which a Partridge, a Fox, a Cock, play their parts with the dispassionate efficiency of the points A, B, C in a proposition of Euclid. In the French 'beast epic' a fresh draft on the memory and imagination of the people produces many stories new to literature, as well as variations of the old; the animals are described in their own shapes and with their own habits, but whimsical effects are obtained by giving them the thoughts and speech of men; they are no longer types, but have character and 'personality'; and they have proper names, some of which have a claim to immortality: men's names like *Reynard*¹ the Fox, Isengrim the Wolf, Bruin the Bear, Tibert the Cat; or descriptive names like Chantecler the 'clear-voiced' Cock, Couart the 'timid' Hare, Noble the Lion. Isengrim

The first trace of the cycle in history is a mention of Isengrim by Guibert de Nogent (d. circa 1125):—Waldric, Bishop of Laon, was accustomed to give a villainous-looking fellow called Teudegald the nickname Isengrim, 'because of his wolfish face'. It seems to have rankled, for Teudegald recalled the insult when he found the Bishop hiding in a cask in the cellar of his church, and beat him unmercifully.² This was in the year 1112.

Isengrim the Wolf is again prominent in the earliest surviving treatment of the cycle—the Latin poem Ysengrimus,³ written by Nivard in the year 1148, probably at Ghent. Nivard is so far old-fashioned that he uses the animal stories to point a heavy satire against corruption in the religious orders; but his poem proves the existence of a connected series of tales; and among them, at the end of the Fourth Book, appears the story of Reynard the Fox and the Cock, who is called Sprotinus, probably because the name Chantecler was not yet fixed in tradition.

¹ In French renard has become the common name of the fox. Like all men's names in the cycle, it is German in origin, Old High German Reginhart, 'the very bold'; for at this time Frankish proper names were usual in France. But Gaston Paris has suggested that the cycle arose on the borders of the Rhine, for the personal name Isengrim, 'iron-mask', is not recorded west of Lorraine, and some minor names have similar geographical limits.

² Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. clvi, col. 927 f.

³ Edited by Ernst Voigt, Halle 1884.

Sprotinus is lord of a dozen hens, and proud of his crowing. Reynard comes in the dress of a pilgrim, and though the Cock is suspicious, induces him by taunts to follow the example of his father and to crow, first standing on one leg with one eye shut, then with both eyes shut. Reynard grabs him; the rustics give chase; the Cock persuades him to shout back defiance, and escapes from his jaws, leaving him to curse his foolish mouth.

Thirty or forty years after Nivard's Ysengrimus, an Alsatian, Heinrich Glichezare, wrote his Reinhart Fuchs,¹ a German poem of some 2,000 lines, which recounts the principal episodes of the Reynard cycle, beginning with the story of Reynard and Chantecler. Heinrich's Reinhart is in the main a translation and abridgement of French originals; but it is important because for the first time it tells the tales without any didactic purpose, and because it is earlier, and in some respects more primitive, than any extant French version. In the part that concerns us, Reinhart Fuchs is much nearer to Chaucer than the works noticed hitherto; but as it cannot be proved that Chaucer used a version nearer in any significant detail to Heinrich's poem than to the French Roman de Renard,² whereas the converse is true in some points, we may pass on at once to the French Roman.

The *Roman de Renard*³ is a collection of over twenty 'branches', composed (for the most part) in the north of France by various poets of the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries. Each branch tells a story or a connected group of stories, but there is no ordered sequence of branches: the Roman grew up, and was not built to a design. Its kernel seems to be the story of the quarrel between Reynard and Ysengrim. Upon this the adventures of Reynard with other animals were easily grafted; and finally some episodes were added in which Reynard is not concerned. Thus the whole work is a loosely assembled body of animal tales in verse, saved from complete incoherence by the presiding genius of Reynard, and by the common desire of the authors to 'give delight and hurt not'.¹

¹ Edited by K. Reissenberger, Halle 1886.

² See § III below.

³ Ed. E. Martin, Strasbourg 1882-7.

The Second Branch, which alone concerns us, is a favourable specimen. After a prologue which promises the story of the war between the barons Reynard and Ysengrim, it begins with Reynard and Chantecler, to whom we shall return. Disconsolate at the loss of his dinner, Reynard meets the Tomtit and varies the old trick, promising to shut his eyes while the Tomtit kisses him; but the Tomtit evades his snap and pushes a handful of moss into his mouth. Next he finds Tibert the Cat alone at play, frisking and chasing his tail; and from sheer malice devises a sport that will lead Tibert into a trap. Tibert, however, notices the trap, and hounds coming up unexpectedly drive Reynard himself into it. He escapes with a mangled paw, and comes upon Tiecelein the Crow, who is gulping down a cheese he has stolen from an old woman. Reynard persuades him to sing in the manner of his father Rohart; and after two trials declares that he would be the finest singer in the world if only he would avoid nuts in his diet. 'One more try,' he begs, and in a last effort Tiecelin lets the cheese slip from his claws.¹ After these diversions Reynard carries on the war, which is his main business, by playing an impudent trick on Ysengrim.

¹ It is often said that an idea underlies all the adventures of Reynard—that his guile succeeds against the strong (e.g. Ysengrim or Bruin) and fails against the weak (e.g. Chantecler). This is an unconsidered result, not a motive. Reynard does succeed against the weak when his object is not to kill: he gets the cheese from Tiecelein the Crow. He fails when his desire is to kill, and the stronger animals fail against him, because the medieval story-tellers were skilled enough in their art to know that it is unwise to dispose of the characters while the story is still popular, and that amusement is not easily extracted from the destruction of the weak by the strong.

Reynard and Tiecelin.

¹ Note that the compiler of this branch recognized the kinship of the Crow story and the Cock story, and assimilated them by making the Crow, too, sing after the model of his father. In Branch ix, l. 570, there is a further assimilation: Tiecelin's father is called Chanteclin ('he who sings with closed eyes'), which is the name of Chantecler's father.

Now that we have seen what the branch contains, let us turn back to its first story, and, for convenience, deal with some 450 lines of the French by a mixture of translation, paraphrase, and abridgement :—

Reynard makes his way to a village in a wood, where there are many cocks and hens, geese and ducks. His special object is a favourite spot of his—the yard of a rich farmer, Constant des Noes, who is abundantly stocked with poultry, salt meat and bacon, good cherries and apples. The yard is well fenced with oak palings and thorn hurdles ; and Reynard can find no way through. Yet he knows that if he jumps over, the hens will see him, and run for shelter under the thorns. At last he finds a broken paling, slips over, and hides among the cabbages. But the hens catch sight of him and run for safety.

Their flurry rouses Chantecler, who is enjoying a dust-bath in a track near the wood, and he walks proudly in, stretching his neck and trailing his wings, to inquire why they ran to the house. His favourite Pinte, ‘she who laid the big eggs’, replies ‘We were frightened’. ‘Why? what did you see?’ ‘Some wild beast who would harm us if we did not take shelter.’ ‘It’s nothing, I’ll swear,’ said the Cock. ‘Don’t be afraid ; you’re quite safe here.’ ‘But I saw it this very minute,’ Pinte insisted. ‘Saw what?’ ‘I saw the fence shake and the cabbage leaves tremble where it lies.’ ‘Pinte,’ said the Cock, ‘no more of this. No fox or polecat would dare come into this yard. A mere illusion, my dear, I assure you ; so come back.’ And back he went himself to his dust-bath, and there settled down, one eye open and one shut, one leg outstretched, the other doubled up.

Wearied of watching and crowing, he slept, and dreamed that there was something in the yard clad in a red fur-coat fringed with bone ; and it thrust the coat upon him to his great discomfort, for the collar was very tight. He starts up in terror : ‘Holy Spirit,’ he prays, ‘save my body from prison this day and keep me safe’ ; and then, all his assurance gone, runs to where the hens are hiding under the thorns, and tells Pinte that he is in great dread of some wild beast or bird. ‘Avoy ! sweet sir,’ says Pinte, ‘you must not talk like that and frighten us so. By all the saints, you are like a dog that howls before the stone hits him ! Why are you so frightened?’ ‘I have had a strange dream’, answers the Cock, ‘and an ill-omened ! That is why you see me so pale. I shall tell you every detail’—(and he goes on to tell of the beast with the red fur-coat). ‘Do you know what it signifies?' 'Please God it turn out false!' says Pinte, 'but I can interpret it. The beast with the red fur-coat is the Fox; the fringe of bone is his teeth; the tight collar his mouth', &c., 'and he will get you by the neck before mid-day is past. I advise you to come back, for I know he is lying in wait for you behind that clump of cabbages.' 'Pinte,' said he, 'this is folly, and it is unworthy of you to say that the beast is in this yard who shall take me by force. Curse him who believes it! for I won't believe this dream portends any harm to me.' 'God grant it may be so,' replied Pinte, 'yet if what I say is false, let me be no more your love.'

Chantecler laughs off the dream, goes back to his dust-bath, and begins to doze again. When he has settled down, Reynard creeps nearer, makes a spring, misses, and sees Chantecler jump to safety on the dunghill. Reynard is chagrined, but immediately sets his brain to work. 'Don't run away, Chantecler,' he cries, 'it is I, your own cousin.' Chantecler crew with relief. 'Do you remember your father Chanteclin?' asks Reynard. 'No cock ever crew like him: one could hear him a league away when he crew with both eyes shut.' 'You aren't trying to trick me, cousin Reynard?' asks Chantecler. 'Indeed no! Try crowing with your eyes shut. We are one flesh and blood, and I would rather lose a paw than see you harmed.' 'I don't believe you,' says Chantecler, 'so please stand a little farther off, and I will crow for you.' 'A high note, then!' says Reynard, smiling. Chantecler crew once, with one eye shut and the other open, for he was suspicious of Reynard, and often looked his way. 'That's nothing,' says Reynard, 'Chanteclin did not crow like that. He shut both eyes and held his note so that he could be heard twenty fields away.' Chantecler, convinced, shuts both eyes to crow. At once Reynard jumps out from under a red cabbage, seizes him by the neck, and off he goes delighted with his prize.

Pinte is beside herself with grief at the sight: 'Sir, now my warning proves true, and you laughed at me and called me a fool! Your pride was your ruin! Alas! I die of grief, for if I lose my lord I lose my honour for ever!'

The good wife opened the door, for it was evening, and called in Pinte, Rosette, and Bise, but no hen came. Then, as she called the Cock loudly, she saw Reynard going off with him, and went to the rescue. Reynard increased his pace, and when she saw she could not catch him, she gave the alarm with a full-throated 'Harrow!' The farm-hands ran to find out what was the matter. 'Alas!' she said, 'disaster has come upon me.'

'How?' 'I have lost my Cock—the Fox has taken him.' 'Old slattern!' cried Constant, 'why didn't you catch the Fox?' 'By all the saints, I couldn't.' 'Why not?' 'He wouldn't wait for me.' 'But you could hit him?' 'What with?' 'With this stick.' 'Indeed I couldn't: he ran so fast that two Breton hounds couldn't have caught him.' 'Which way?' 'That way, just there.' The farm-hands ran shouting 'There he is! There he is!' Just then Reynard reached the opening and jumped down with such a thud that the pursuers heard him. 'There he is! There he is!' they cry. 'After him,' shouts Constant, and calls his dog Mauvoisin. 'After him, Bardolph, Travers, Humbaut, Rebors!' They get sight of Reynard, and shout 'There goes the Fox'.

The Chase.

Now Chantecler is in great peril, and needs all his wits.

'Reynard,' he says, 'can't you hear the insults these men are shouting at you? When Constant shouts "Reynard has him" why not mock him by answering "in your despite"?' Reynard's cunning for once was at fault. 'In your despite!' he yelled, and as the Cock felt his jaws relax, he beat his wings, and flew into an apple-tree. Then he laughed at Reynard, who stood below disgusted at his own folly: 'Reynard,' he said, 'what do you think of it all?' Reynard quivered with rage: 'Cursed be the mouth', he said, 'that makes a noise when it should be silent.' 'And', says the Cock, 'I say a plague on the eyes that sleep when they ought to keep watch!' Then Chantecler rates Reynard for his perfidy and bids him be off before he loses his skin. Reynard runs on dejected at the loss of his dinner.

This is the Roman de Renard at its best. The subsequent history of the cycle in France is one of rapid decline in the hands of didactic writers, who represent Reynard as the embodiment of evil, and gradually crush the gaiety out of his adventures by loading them with crude satire, or moral lessons, or still less relevant instruction.¹ Before the end of the fourteenth century the subject was exhausted and discarded in French literature. Probably the best of the separate stories were repeated until they sank back to the level of folk tales; but the cycle lived on in European literature through an early thirteenth-century Flemish version,² which spread eastward into Germany to be the basis of Reineke Fuchs (Goethe's

¹ The three later French versions are:

(i) Le Couronnement Renard, written soon after 1250, in which Reynard, who is the type of successful hypocrisy and wickedness, succeeds the Lion as King of the Beasts.

(ii) Renard le Nouveau, written by Gelée of Lille about 1300, which tells of the unsuccessful war of Noble the Lion, representing Virtue, against Reynard, representing Vice.

(iii) Renard le Contrefait (ed. G. Raynaud and H. Lemaître, Paris 1914), written at Troyes early in the fourteenth century by a merchant who had been a clerk. Here satire and morality are combined with all manner of irrelevant information.

² Van den Vos Reinaerde, ed. E. Martin, Paderborn, 1874.

original) and westward into England as Caxton's Historye of Reynart the Foxe.¹

III. CHAUCER'S TREATMENT.

The tracing of sources is chiefly valuable because it shows how deeply Chaucer's work is rooted in the past. But if any one hopes to account for all the details of his version by long hunting among his predecessors, it is a vain hope. Invention usually baffles this kind of investigation, and it is seldom possible to do more with safety than say that a turn or incident is in this text and not in that. To go further and explain the relations between two texts, such as the Renard story and the Nun's Priest's Tale, involves a good deal of conjecture.

At the outset some questions suggest themselves. (i) Did Chaucer know the Roman de Renard? Observe the difference in the names: Chantecler, Pinte, Renard, in the Roman; Chantecler, Pertelote, Russell, in Chaucer. That Pinte should take another French name is perhaps not very important, though it is a break with well-established tradition. But it is no small matter that the famous Reynard, whom the imagination of French poets a century before had raised to the lordship of the world, should be given a mere descriptive name Russell 'the red',² which in the Roman belongs to the obscure red squirrel. The substitution is hardly credible if Chaucer took his matter directly from the Reynard cycle: it indicates that his source was a story detached from the cycle, in which Chantecler had become the chief actor, and Reynard, stripped of his personality and the prestige of his other exploits, had sunk back to be just a wily fox. Then it would be natural enough for Chaucer to give the fox a current name with no literary traditions behind it, like 'Colle oure dogge' and the 'sheep that highte Malle'. And Pinte, too, may have become anonymous before she attained to the dignity of 'Madame Pertelote'.¹

¹ 'I have not added ne mynussed (diminished), but have folowed as nyghe as I can my cotype whiche was in Dutche, and by me William Caxton translated into this rude and symple Englyssh, in th'abbey of Westmestre synysshed the vi daye of Juyn, the yere of our lord MCCCCLXXXI.' From the Epilogue, ed. Arber, London 1880.

² Russell is the name of one of Reynard's children in Caxton's version from the Flemish. But there is no reason to think that Chaucer (or a predecessor) borrowed the name, which is an obvious one for a red thing or person.

This indication is confirmed when we find that Chaucer only once in his works names Reynard, and there it is a common name for the fox.² He does not refer to any other incident in the Roman de Renard. And the case is the same with the two great contemporary poems—Piers Plowman and Gower's Confessio Amantis—in which the authors had opportunity to mention anything that was much in their thoughts. It is hard to resist the conclusion that the Reynard cycle had gone out of fashion in England, as it had in France, by the latter half of the fourteenth century.³ The separate stories may have lived on; and though there is not much doubt that all were told in England at one time or another, it happens that the cycle is represented in the extant remains of Middle English by two stories only—the thirteenth-century *Fox and Wolf*¹ and Chaucer's Nun's Priest's Tale. Caxton, as we have seen, had to go to Flanders for his Reynard the Fox. Chaucer may never have known the cycle as a whole.

¹ 'It is ful faire to been y-clept Madame', and more honour still to give a name to a long line of partlets.

² Legend of Good Women, l. 2448.

³ The representations in carving require further investigation; but where several scenes of the Reynard story appear, e.g. at Bristol, the subjects and the late date indicate that they derive from Caxton's version. Some late fourteenth-century and early fifteenth-century carvings have a goose instead of a cock, which shows that their relation with the Roman de Renard is not close. It is worth noting that the distaff which appears in Chaucer l. 618, in The False Fox (note to l. 569), in all the carvings of the chase, and in some illustrations of the Roman (e.g. that reproduced at p. xxi), is not specified in the Roman itself, nor is there a trace of it in the other literary versions.

(ii) What was the language of Chaucer's source? The evidence for a French original is clear: Avoi! cries Pinte in the Roman when Chantecler says he is frightened by his dream, and Avoy! cries Pertelote at the same place (l. 142): the word is not used elsewhere in Chaucer. The Fox shouts Maugre vostre at his pursuers in the Roman, and Maugree youre heed! in Chaucer (l. 646). But it is not possible to say whether these phrases come to Chaucer direct from French, or whether they were transmitted through an English intermediary, for both are found earlier in Middle English.²

(iii) Is the ultimate source the Roman de Renard or some other French version? That Chaucer takes his story from a version identical with the Roman in some details of phrasing appears from the examples just quoted, and from the Cock's prayer after his dream, where the Roman has Seint Esperiz, Garis hui mon cors de prison = 'God . . . Kepe my body out of foul prisoun' (l. 130f.). But in the broader lines of treatment Chaucer is sometimes nearer to Heinrich Glichezare and Marie de France. For example, the Fox's first spring, which spoils the story by giving Chantecler full warning of Reynard's purpose, is peculiar to the Roman, and it has been shown¹ that it is an interpolation from another branch of the cycle. The absence of this incident in Chaucer might seem at first sight to be evidence that he used a version more primitive in this respect than the Roman. But it is the kind of detail that Chaucer himself, or an intermediary, would discard, just as Chantecler's crowing first with one eye shut is discarded, though it is proved to be primitive by Gallus et Vulpes and Nivard's Ysengrimus. Any shortening of the Roman version, in which the action is most fully developed, must tend to approach the simpler early forms by the dropping of less essential incidents. It cannot be proved by comparison with other versions that the Nun's Priest's Tale is not in the direct line of descent from the Roman de Renard; and as the likeness of phrasing is easiest explained by assuming a direct line of descent, that assumption should be preferred.²

¹ Often printed, e.g. in Middle English Humorous Tales, ed. G. H. McKnight, Boston 1913.

² harow, one of three exclamations in l. 614, is paralleled by harou in the Roman, but the expression is too common in French and Middle English to have any value as evidence of relation.

(iv) Our first deduction—that Chaucer did not take his story directly from the Roman, and our third—that it is in the direct line of descent from the Roman, raise the question of lost intermediate versions. It is impossible to make a useful guess at their number, which (in the absence of evidence) might be two or twenty. But it is unlikely that all the lost intermediaries were written. No scribe or editor, and certainly no poet of Chaucer's ability, would have sacrificed so many of the good things of the Roman if he had had them before him in writing. A stage of oral tradition, in which the text might suffer from faults of memory or from the limits of time imposed on the story-teller, will best account for the shortening and simplification of the plot; for the change or disappearance of important proper names; the faithful preservation of trivial phrases uttered at critical moments; and the loss of literary finish—all of which may reasonably be assumed in Chaucer's immediate source, whether that source was oral or written.

¹ By Voretzsch, Zeitschrift für romanische Philologie, vol. xv (1891), pp. 136 ff. A valuable article.

² Miss Petersen On the Sources, &c., assumes a lost source combining features from the Roman and from Heinrich Glichezare, but her conclusions are pushed too far.

Other divergences fit well enough with these conclusions. In the Roman Pinte warns Chantecler that his dream means immediate danger, and he laughs at her fears; in Chaucer he is afraid of his dream and she laughs at him, putting her faith in the herbs which he scorns. Here the essential thing for the story is the domestic difference of opinion: the sides taken do not matter so much. But in the Roman Chantecler is at first afraid and Pinte is derisive ('You are like the dog that howls before the stone hits him'); and derived versions, or even Chaucer himself, whose sympathies as between husband and wife are not in doubt, might well choose to develop the argument along these lines.

Then, again, in the Roman there is an elaborate account of the farm of Constant de Noes, of the arrangements for keeping Reynard out of this fox's paradise, and his successful entry. In Chaucer a poor widow owns the yard. There is no need to suppose that Chaucer metamorphosed the rich farmer into the poor widow. In the shortening of the story when it was separated from the cycle, the name of Constant de Noes would naturally disappear, together with the details of Reynard's approach. But at the starting of the chase the farmer's wife must be prominent, as she is in the Roman, however much the story is cut down. Even the carvings of the scene find room for her. From this part of the tale Chaucer (or an intermediary) would assume that she was the owner of the yard and the Cock.

This leads to the last point we need notice: In the Roman attention is focussed on Reynard from the beginning, and all his movements are minutely recorded. In Chaucer he does not appear at all till the tale is half told. This is what we should expect. The Roman is the Roman de Renard, and each of its stories is told as an episode in his career. But when one of them is detached from its setting, Reynard loses in importance. The centre of interest shifts, and the Nun's Priest justly says 'My tale is of a Cok'.

We have lingered over the plot; yet on a strict reckoning it takes up barely a fifth of Chaucer's narrative. His own work appears most in the embroidering by which he made an old story new. He begins with a description of the poor widow and her household (55-80), which is as sharp as any in the Prologue, and is unmistakably his own. Her humble roof supplies the perch for the more brilliant household of a prince among cocks, and the description of Chantecler and his wives (81-115) brings us closer to the matter. With Chantecler's dream (116-41), which includes a miniature portrait of the Fox, all the characters are introduced, and the story begins in earnest. But almost immediately Madame Pertelote strays into considerations on the ideal husband (145-51); and then she launches the subject of dreams and their medical aspects (155-203). Chantecler refutes her by the stock examples: two dream stories taken ultimately from Cicero (218-338) with a minor digression on the theme 'Murder will out' (284-91); St. Kenelm (344-55); Scipio's Dream (356-60); Daniel, Joseph, Pharaoh (361-9); Croesus and Andromache (370-82)—till dawn, calling him to his duty, brings relief (383 f.). Not till l. 406 does he fly down from his perch, and it takes some dozen lines more

(421-33) to bring out the date of the fatal morning, and its astrological significance.¹

At the close of his argument he had felt something of the melancholy grandeur of doomed Hector; but Pertelote's beauty (394-6) banishes his fears. He turns the ominous 'Mulier est hominis confusio' to a jest; and the spring day (434-7) raises him to the height of joy which goes before tragedy. Hence some reflections on 'ever the latter end of joy is woe' (439-43), followed by an assurance that the story is true (444-7), and a promise to get on with it (448), which is fulfilled when the Fox is introduced into the yard (449-57), like the Serpent into Eden (cp. l. 492). But only eight lines are spared for the story proper. Famous traitors—Judas Iscariot, Ganelon, Sinon—are brought to mind (461-3); the evil day is cursed (464-7); a promising excursus on predestination is begun (468-84), only to be dismissed as irrelevant to the 'tale of a Cok'; and the folly of taking women's advice is exposed (490-500). Then for a while the tale goes on smoothly: there are brief asides on mermaids (505 f.) and on natural antipathies (513-15), but the Fox in his long speech (518-55) sticks to the point unswervingly, speaking not a word in vain, and falling into reminiscence only to tell of a cock that was very ingenious, yet not comparable in discretion with Chantecler's father who crew with both eyes shut. Chantecler beats his wings to crow, but before he can rise on his toes six lines on flattery are interpolated (559-64), and his capture opens the floodgates of digression: there is an appeal to Destiny, another to Venus, a dig at Geoffrey de Vinsauf's chiding of 'the Friday' (572-88); the classical scenes of women's wailing are recalled (589-607); and still another promise is given to return to the story. And now, with fully half the action untold and a tenth of his time left, Chaucer fulfils his promise: from the moment the widow starts the chase till the moral ends the tale, there is no pause.

¹ May 3 is one of the 'Egyptian days', or dies mali, on which it is dangerous to undertake anything. The day was the unlucky Friday, Venus's day, and the sun was in Taurus, the 'house' of Venus.

No evidence suggests that Chaucer found these diversions in his immediate source: they appear to be his own contribution to the story. And they serve one general purpose. The great scene in the tale of the Cock and the Fox, as we know from book-illustrations and carvings, and, indeed, from Chaucer's own treatment, is the scurrying chase that turns a peaceful farmyard into pandemonium; and he deliberately holds back this scene, approaching it as slowly and indirectly as his audience will permit. For he is both entertaining them and teasing them with suspense and irrelevance: he keeps an eye on them all the time, gauging to a nicety how far he can go without spoiling their pleasure, cajoling them with a promise¹ or muffling a protest by protesting first.² But when once the chase is started, his burst of pace is all the more effective by contrast. A score of verses (611-35) are crowded with noise and action, and nothing is allowed to drag afterwards: even the moral, which at an earlier stage might have given rise to long discussion, is dispatched in two business-like lines (670f.).

If now we compare Chaucer's additions with the handling of the same plot in the Roman de Renard, a notable difference appears. The Roman version rattles along, almost without reflections and digressions; there is plenty of lively detail, but it springs naturally out of the action, and there is no clear-cut distinction between the story itself and the divagations from it. This is not a difference between two individual poets, or two nations: the same tendency for description, discussion, and moralizing comment to grow till they clog the story, may be seen if a fourteenth-century English romance is compared with one of the early thirteenth century, or if the late French Renard le Contrefait is set beside the Roman de Renard. In fact, description and digression were the vices of narrative in Chaucer's day. He made description one of the chief merits of his poetry by freeing it of convention and using it with masterly restraint; but though he knew the dangers well enough, he was too much a man of his time to escape altogether from the snares of digression.

¹ But I wol passe as lightly as I kan, 173; And after wol I telle his aventure, 420; Now wol I torne agayn to my sentence, 448; cp. 608.

² I wol nat han to do of swich matiere,—

My tale is of a Cok, as ye may heere. ll. 485 f.

It may be said that in the Nun's Priest's Tale he is laughing at this literary vice, and in a sense that is true. But it is an unusual kind of laughter. For there is little doubt that some such interpolations, taken seriously, were to the taste of his audience, so that they must laugh at themselves. And there is a further complexity: Chaucer liked them. The long excursus on dreams is paralleled by the serious argument in Troilus v, 358-85; predestination is dragged into Troilus iv, 961 ff., with no artistic excuse; and the Franklin's Tale is marred for modern readers by the citation of Hasdrubal's wife and other classical parallels (F. 1367-1456) after the manner of ll. 589 ff. So in these digressions Chaucer is indulging his inclination and laughing at himself too. And this is one of the attractions of his work. A man who is in part his own butt is not likely to be a savage and uncomfortable satirist; and a man who can look at things from so many sides that he sees the ridiculous in himself will be a tolerant and easy companion; though if he is very self-conscious, as Chaucer was, too keen a sense of the ridiculous may cumber him in the higher flights of poetry. Besides, there is a fascination in trying to follow the thoughts of such a Proteus, where the chances of being deluded are high. Do ll. 581 ff., for instance, mean simply that he had a good-natured contempt for Geoffrey de Vinsauf, or may we read between the lines that he had studied the Nova Poetria seriously as part of his training in the art of poetry, and that it still had a place in his uncritical affections? To know for certain when he is wholly in earnest and when he writes wholly in fun is the hardest problem that Chaucer has left to his readers.†

In what has just been said, it is assumed that Chaucer is not laughing at his own views and practices because he has outgrown them, but because he is in the mood for laughing; and on this assumption we cannot infer that the Nun's Priest's Tale is necessarily later than other works (like Troilus) whose weaknesses it seems to expose. Nor can any certain conclusion as to the date of composition be drawn from the indications that the tale was not specially written for its present place in the series.¹ There is no satisfactory evidence that fixes the date within the obvious limits established by Chaucer's death in 1400, and by a casual reference to the massacre of Flemings in June 1381 (ll. 628 ff.).² But at least we may be sure that it was written in a happy time—not necessarily a time of posts and pensions, or even of good bodily health, but one in which he felt his powers at the full. The whimsical subject called for all his subtlety. He had to keep a nice balance between the natural characters of the animals and their human attributes, for on the clash and blending of these much of the humour depends. Where the whole machinery of mock-heroic treatment would be too artificial, and the simple story of a farm-yard incident too plain, he had to combine the interests of both. If the mock-heroical element gave him an opportunity to display his curious learning, it was on condition that he also displayed its vanity. Above all, he must resist the temptation to fall into serious satire, which would break the fantasy. He succeeded, where so many failed, by serene good temper as well as art, and it is this that makes the Nun's Priest's Tale the favourite of most readers of The Canterbury Tales.

¹ See p. xli below, and the notes to ll. 372, 604 f. The opposite view, that the main story and some of its digressions belong to the type of exempla, or sermon stories, and are therefore specially fitted to a priest, is not well founded, for a very large proportion of medieval stories are exempla.

² See the Notes, p. 57. It is almost the only sign of the stirring times in which he lived that Chaucer allows to appear in the Canterbury Tales.

IV. THE SETTING

It remains to see how Chaucer gave the story a new setting in The Canterbury Tales, which he designed to be no mere collection, but an organized work: the tales are pulled together, so that their several merits may be enhanced, by a frame describing the Canterbury pilgrims and the course of their story-telling, which comprises the Prologue; the preambles of the Wife of Bath, Pardoner, and Canon's Yeoman; the links between tales; and the 'Retracciouns'¹ at the end.

When he took this project in hand, about the year 1386, Chaucer had some stories by him which he could adapt;² but he intended to write many more, and his first plan was a spacious one. It is outlined by the Host when the pilgrims are assembled at the Tabard Inn, Southwark, the night before they start for Canterbury :

¹ See the note to l. 679 (ii).

² The Second Nun's Tale of St. Cecilia is a clear instance; it is a separate story which Chaucer refers to in the Prologue to the Legend of Good Women, and it is not adapted at all to the teller. There is a prayer to those 'that reden that I write', and the 'I' is elsewhere described as 'unworthy sone of Eve'.

Ech of yow, to shortē with oure weye,
 In this viâge shal tellē tales tweye,—
 To Caunterbury-ward, I mene it so,
 And homward he shal tellen othere two,—
 Of áventûres that whilom han bifalle:
 And which of yow that bereth hym best of alle,
 That is to seyn, that telleth in this caas
 Tales of best sentēce and moost soláas,
 Shal have a soper at oure aller cost,
 Heere in this placē, sittynge by this post,
 Whan that we come agayn fro Caunterbury.

As there were 'wel nine and twenty'¹ in the company besides our Host of the Tabard, and Chaucer himself, who was to be a story-teller as well as the reporter for all, this plan would call for one hundred and twenty-four tales, if the Canon and his Yeoman, who first joined the party at Boughton-under-Blean, are left out of the count. But Chaucer found the task too heavy, and shortened his plan to one tale apiece on the outward journey; for when Canterbury is near, the Host calls on the Parson, saying :

Now lakketh us no tales mo than oon . . .
 For every man save thou hath told his tale.

The Parson agrees to 'telle a myrie tale in prose

 To knytte up al this feeste and make an ende';

and as soon as it is told, the author takes leave in his 'Retracciouns'.

Even on this reduced scale the work was not finished. Only twenty complete tales are told, including the Canon's Yeoman's. Two more break off abruptly without explanation: the Cook barely begins his tale of Perkin Revelour,¹ and the Squire 'leaves half-told the story of Cambuskan bold'. Two more, Chaucer's own Sir Thopas and the Monk's Tale,² are stopped by the Host and the Knight. And Chaucer had not so far decided on the tales that were to fill the gaps, and the manner of their treatment, as to supply the links which would have made the arrangement certain. There are several loose ends—tales that are not linked to anything before them, like the Man of Law's, or tales that are not linked to anything following, like the Nun's Priest's. Whether Death, 'the privy thief', came upon him unawares, or whether the zest or inspiration went from him before he died, he seems to have left behind a bundle of manuscript, partly finished and partly in the rough, in which the tales were arranged in groups but not as a whole series;³ and editors ever since have laboured to catch his intentions.

¹ In fact thirty are mentioned in the Prologue.

What would modern editors give for the opportunity Chaucer's executors had! Lacking it, they have done their best to arrange the groups, and Furnivall's order has been most favoured. Assuming that the references to the route of the pilgrims (and to a less extent the indications of time) can be relied on, and that in those days of bad roads a leisurely pilgrimage from London to Canterbury would take four days, he obtains the following table. The capital letters show the breaks in the series, and for purposes of reference each group of linked tales is known by the capital that precedes it:—

¹ The incomplete Cook's Tale follows the Reeve's on the first day. But on the last day the Host calls on him as if he had not yet told a tale. He is then too drunk to respond and the Manciple takes his place.

² But the Monk's Tale is of the kind that might begin or end anywhere.

³ This does not imply that at Chaucer's death there was but one copy of each tale or group. It is probable that some of the tales had been circulated during his lifetime.

The Nun's Priest's Tale

- Day i. A. Tales of the Knight, Miller, Reeve, Cook . . .
Halt for the night at Dartford.
- ii. B. Tales of the Man of Law, Shipman, Prioress, Chaucer (two), Monk, Nun's Priest. Halt for the night at Rochester.
- iii. C. Tales of the Doctor and Pardoner?; D. Wife of Bath, Friar, Sumner; E. Clerk and Merchant. Halt for the night at Ospringe.
- iv. F. Tales of the Squire . . . and Franklin; G. Second Nun, Canon's Yeoman; H. Manciple; and I. Parson. Arrival at Canterbury.

The Pilgrims' Way to Canterbury.

In this arrangement several points are debatable, but at least it is certain that the Nun's Priest's Tale is told not far from Rochester (because when the Host asks the Monk to begin the tale which precedes it he says 'Lo! Rouchestre stant heer faste by!'); that Chaucer thinks of the story as being told on a spring day (he dates the Man of Law's Tale on the 18th of April); and that from the Shipman's Tale¹ to the Nun's Priest's Tale the series is unbroken, with all the links complete.

Such a series enables us to study Chaucer's skill in the management of his materials. In assigning tales to their tellers he observes one general rule: although the pilgrims are nearly all of the middle class,¹ he more than once distinguishes the 'gentils' from the rest,² and he is careful to give the 'gentils'—the Knight, Squire, Franklin, Doctor, Man of Law, Monk, Prioress, Clerk, Parson—tales that conform to courtesy and 'gentilesse'. As for the order of telling, the Knight, who is the chief man present, very appropriately draws the lot for the first tale, and the Parson tells the last because all the company are agreed 'to enden in som vertuouse sentence'. But in between there is no order of precedence. Sometimes the pilgrims take charge, as on the first day when the drunken Miller follows the Knight because nobody can stop him, and the Reeve, whom he provokes, is allowed to tell a tale of a miller in reply. At other times, the Host, who is the agreed arbiter, calls upon a pilgrim, reminding him of his compact to obey; and it so happens that in this particular series the Host fixes the order throughout.

¹ The linking of the Shipman's Tale with the Man of Law's depends on one MS. of inferior authority; but it is a happy guess.

His principle is simple: he likes variety and contrast, and though he can appreciate a sad tale, he wants a merry one to follow.³ But let us watch him at work. The Shipman's Tale, which is merry and not genteel, wins his approval:

'Wel seyde, by corpus dominus!' quod our Hoost,
'Now longe moote thou saillé by the coost,
Sire gentil maister, gentil maryneer!'

But he immediately singles out the Prioress by way of

¹ Knights were reckoned as leaders of the commons. The only poor labourer is the Plowman, and he could hardly be omitted in the days of Piers Plowman.

² e. g. in the link following the Knight's Tale and in that before the Pardoner's Prologue.

³ After the Doctor's story of Appius and Virginia he declares:

'By corpus bones! but I have triacle,
Or elles a draughte of moyste and corny ale,
Or but I heere anon a myrie tale,
Myn herte is lost for pitee of this mayde.'

contrast, and with studied diffidence and courtesy invites her to begin. The Prioress, as might be expected, chooses a religious subject—the exquisite legend of the schoolboy martyr whose heart was set upon singing O Alma Redemptoris Mater. When she had finished, says Chaucer, every man

As sobre was that wonder was to se,
Til that oure Hoosté japen tho began,
And thanne at erst he looked upon me
And seyde thus: 'What man artow?' quod he.
'Thou lookest as thou woldest fynde an hare,
For evere upon the ground I se thee stare.¹
Approchè neer and looke up murily.
Now war yow, sires, and lat this man have place;
He in the waast is shape as wel as I . . .
He semeth elvyssh² by his contenance,
For unto no wight dooth he daliaunce . . .
Telle us a tale of myrthe, and that anon.

Then Chaucer begins 'a rym I lerned longe agoon'—the Tale of Sir Thopas, which is the type of rimed romances in their last degeneracy, rich in jingling rimes, elaborate conventional descriptions, elf-queens and three-headed giants, but almost without action. As he begins the second fit, the parody becomes more obvious; and the Host, who had expected 'som deyntee thyng', can bear it no longer:

'Namoore of this, for Goddes dignitee!'
Quod oure Hoosté, 'for thou makest me
So wery of thy verray lewednesse³ . . .
Mine eres aken of thy drasty speche.'

Chaucer asks why he alone should be stopped, since

¹ A critic (Mod. Lang. Notes, 1925, p. 54) has urged that this is not a 'permanent' description of Chaucer, and that his eyes were cast down in sadness after the Prioress's tale. But ever cannot mean 'for the last ten minutes' (the sad part of the Prioress's tale would take no longer to tell). Besides, something distinctive attracts the Host's attention to Chaucer, and an attitude accounted for by a momentary sadness which all the company share, would not be remarkable.

² elvish here perhaps means 'moon-struck'.

³ i.e. rusticity.

it is the best rime he knows, and gets a downright answer :

'Thou doost noght elles but despendest tyme,— Sire, at o word, thou shalt no lenger ryme.
Lat se wher thou kanst tellen aught in geeste,¹
Or telle in prosè somewhat, at the leeste,
In which ther be som murthe or som doctryne.

Chaucer on Pilgrimage. From the Ellesmere MS.

This last suggestion is taken up in Chaucer's tale of Melibeus, which reports the proverbial consolations Dame Prudence gave to her husband Melibeus, after she had been beaten and her daughter wounded to death by his enemies. It is a testimony to the medieval liking for didactic works that this story, so wearisome now, was heard to the end. The Host merely regrets that his own shrewish wife had not the chance of hearing it and acquiring a little of the saintly patience of Dame Prudence. Then he calls on the Monk with some rough banter, and the too ready response might have been a warning: 'I shall do my best', says the Monk,

¹ Alliterative verse.

'to tellè yow a tale or two or three,
And if yow list to herkne hyderward¹
I wol yow seyn the lyf of Seint Edward;
Or elles first tragédies wol I telle,
Of whiche I have an hundred in my celle.'

Tragedy it is—the fall of the prosperous—and he settles down to do it thoroughly, beginning his examples as far back as Lucifer and Adam. It was a favourite theme in the Middle Ages, but a monotonous and gloomy theme for such an occasion; and when the Monk reaches his seventeenth tragedy, the Knight, oppressed perhaps by the thought of the other eighty-three in his cell, calls 'Hoo!' and explains (for he is a master of tact) that this cumulation of misfortune is painful to him. The Host avows more bluntly that he is bored:

'Swich talkyng is nat worth a boterflye,
For therinne is ther no desport ne game.'

He longs more than ever for a merry tale, and as the Monk refuses to tell a hunting story, he calls the Nun's Priest into the centre of the group of riders: 'Telle us swich thyng as may oure hertes glade'. This time he gets the merry tale of the Cock and the Fox.

Modern criticism has gained so much by the close study of the frame into which the Canterbury tales are fitted, that there is a tendency to push ingenuity in this direction beyond the limits of good sense, and to interpret the tales themselves as if they were speeches by the actors in a play. The stressing of some favourable passages has given rise to the conception of Chaucer as a dramatic genius, which seems to be radically unsound if 'dramatic' is used in contradistinction to 'narrative', or indeed in any strict sense. A general congruence there is between his characters and their words,¹ and he can both devise appropriate action and describe it; but these qualities belong to good narrative as well as to drama. On the other hand, the detachment of the tales from their frame is generally well marked: once a tale begins, it is exceptional to find any certain reference to the teller, the company, or the pilgrimage, until it ends.² And there are several discordant indications: the Knight speaks as if he were writing his tale;³ so does the Franklin;⁴ the Canon's Yeoman⁵ apologizes to 'Canons religious', though there is none among the pilgrims, explaining that

¹ i.e. to me.

'This talè was nat oonly toold for yow—
But eek for othere moo;'

and in the Merchant's tale, of which the scene is laid in Italy, Justin, giving advice to his brother on marriage, refers to the Wife of Bath, Chaucer's own creation!⁶

¹ I pass over the Second Nun's Tale (see p. xxxiii, footnote) and the Shipman's Tale, which was written originally for a woman—probably the Wife of Bath—assuming that Chaucer would have removed the anomalies. But a dramatist would scarcely hope to get a good result by such adaptation.

² Where there are special preambles—the Pardoner, Wife of Bath, Canon's Yeoman—the frame and tale are fused together.

³ 'But of that storie list me nat to write,' A. 1201.

⁴ F. 1548 ff.

⁵ Canon's Yeoman's Tale, G. 1000 f. See also the note to ll. 559 ff.

⁶ E. 1685 ff. I do not overlook the interpretation of these lines as an

But all of these are explained if Chaucer felt himself as the teller.¹ And is not that the impression of most readers? Except at the beginning and end, do we feel in the tale of the Cock and the Fox that it is a priest who is speaking, and would our enjoyment be less or different if the tale had been given to the Squire or the Franklin? Is the discussion of predestination (ll. 468 ff.) better suited to a priest in the presence of his superior, the Prioress, than to the author of Troilus iv. 960 ff.? Or are the words 'O Gaufred deere maister soverayn' (l. 581) as apt in the Priest's mouth as in Chaucer's? If The Canterbury Tales is to be judged as a drama, it comes off poorly. The author is an actor himself, the only one with a doubled part; he makes the Man of Law give an account of his earlier poems; he is constantly intruding his own opinions, and peeping round the curtain to show himself to the audience or see how they like his work—a serious fault in a dramatist. But this refusal to be impersonal, and to lose himself in the creatures of his imagination, has a large part in Chaucer's greatness as a narrative poet. He establishes with his readers a relation so direct, easy, and personal that his inconsistencies are forgiven; and no later poet can rival him in this, for he learned his art in a school which trained an author to address a group no larger than the reach of his voice, or a few friends in his chamber, where he could feel his hold on the listeners, and respond to every flicker on their faces.

aside by the Merchant, but prefer the reading which has the best manuscript support, and the plain meaning of the words.

¹ He refers to the Wife of Bath in almost the same words in his Envoy to Bukton 'touching marriage'.

GEOFFREY CHAUCER, son of John Chaucer, wine merchant, of London, was born about 1340. By 1357 he had begun his career as a page in the household of Lionel, Duke of Clarence. In 1359 he was with the army in France: he was taken prisoner, and his ransom was paid in March 1360. In 1367 he received a pension as a member (dilectus valettus) of the King's household. In 1369, on the death of Blanche, wife of John of Gaunt, he wrote his Deth of Blanche the Duchesse, the first evidence of an important friendship with John of Gaunt.

He became a trusted member of the diplomatic service, visiting France several times (1369-78), Flanders (1377), Italy (1372-3 and 1378); and he was successful, if we may judge from the favours that came his way:—another pension, a pitcher of wine daily, the Comptrollership of the Customs of Wools, Skins, and Hides (1374); the wardship of two minors (1375); the proceeds of a heavy fine (1376); the sinecure Comptrollership of Petty Customs at London (1382); and the right to discharge his other more onerous Comptrollership by deputy (1385). In 1386 he became member of Parliament for Kent. During this prosperous period he wrote his version of Boethius; the Hous of Fame; the Parlement of Foules (1382?); Troilus; and the Legend of Good Women (1386?); and he probably planned the Canterbury Tales, his last great work.

But with the failure of John of Gaunt's party in the autumn of 1386, he lost both his Comptrollerships: and he saw lean days till 1389, when Richard II made him Commissioner of Works. This post, too, he lost in 1391: but in 1394 another pension was granted him. In his latter years he was often in debt. We need not picture him in misery, for debt is sometimes the result of living well. In 1399 he greeted the new king Henry IV with his last work, the Compleynt to his Purse. It gained him another pension, which he did not long enjoy. He died in 1400, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

He had married Philippa, a lady of the court, perhaps in 1366. She died in 1387. For a 'littel son Lowis', then ten years old and at Oxford, he wrote the Treatise on the Astrolabe in 1391.

THE TEXT

THE text is based on the published facsimile of the Ellesmere MS., with reference to the Chaucer Society's prints of seven other complete MSS. of the Tales, and particularly to the Hengwrt and Corpus MSS.

In this tale the Ellesmere text is generally careful, but it has several patent errors (e.g. ll. 128, 161, 165, 448, 496, 526, 596, 656), and none of its peculiar readings is so good that it can be retained with certainty. Hengwrt, because of its near relation to Ellesmere, is a valuable check on arbitrary scribal changes in that MS.; but in the Nun's Priest's Tale its contamination with the Corpus group (e.g. in the omission of ll. 5-24) lessens its value as a witness to the original of the Ellesmere text. The Corpus MS., though careless in general, has some readings of independent authority, and I have assumed that in one place at least, l. 620, it enables us to get behind an error common to the other groups of MSS. (see the note). In this line the reading of the Harleian MS. 7334, which has been accepted by most modern editors, should be rejected. In the Nun's Priest's Tale the Harleian MS. has many readings in common with the Corpus type; it contributes nothing of value to the text; and even if y-gon in l. 652 is right, it is better explained as an obvious emendation by the editor of the Harleian text than as an original reading preserved only in that branch of the MS. tradition.

The acceptance of the Epilogue (see note to l. 43), or any part of it, as Chaucer's work raises difficult problems, for it is not in the best MSS.—of the eight printed by the Chaucer Society only Cambridge Dd. contains it. We need to know how it got into the inferior MSS., or how it got out of the majority and the best, and no really satisfactory explanation has been put forward. To assume that Chaucer left one manuscript which contained in the form of marginalia, interlineations, &c. all the variant readings it is convenient to attribute to him, is an elaborate way of evading the problems set by divergences in the extant MSS.

Every departure from the Ellesmere MS. is recorded in the footnotes, where MS. indicates that the reading is found only in Ellesmere, and MS. &c. that at least one of the printed manuscripts agrees with Ellesmere. Some noteworthy variants taken from the prints of the other MSS. are also included. In choosing these, regard has been had to the most authoritative classifications of the MSS.; but it seemed better not to specify the sources of the variants, as the information would necessarily be incomplete and misleading. The verse paragraphs of the Ellesmere MS. are preserved. Capitals, punctuation, and the use of v:u, j:i are modern. Where final -e must be pronounced as a separate syllable to make up the rhythm, I have printed é, except at the end of the line, where -e is normally syllabic, and in words like nevere (pronounced nev/re) where never would serve for the metre. Divergences from the modern English incidence of stress are marked by accents placed over the first vowel of the stressed syllable: an acute accent when the first or second syllable is stressed, e.g. tragédie; a grave accent where the third, fourth, or fifth syllable is stressed, e.g. ascencidun, altercacidun. This method has the advantage of showing that ascencidun must be read as a/scen/ci/oun, with four syllables, and Pharad as Pha/ra/o with three. The first syllable of a nine-syllable line is also marked with the acute accent.

MATERIALS FOR THE TEXT

The Ellesmere Chaucer reproduced in facsimile, 2 vols, Manchester 1911.

Chaucer Society's Publications, Series I, especially

The Six-Text Chaucer (1868-).

The separate prints of MS. Harley 7334 (1885) and MS. Cambridge Univ. Dd. 4. 24 (1901-2).

Skeat, W. W. The Works of Geoffrey Chaucer, 7 vols., Oxford 1894-7.

McCormick, Sir. W. The Manuscripts of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, Oxford 1933.

SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY¹

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL.

- Hammond, Miss E. P., Chaucer: A Bibliographical Manual, New York 1908. [Excellent.]
Wells, J. E., A Manual of the Writings in Middle English, 1050-1400, New Haven &c. 1916; Supplements, 1919, 1924.
Brusendorff, A., The Chaucer Tradition, London 1925. [Stimulating, but uneven.]
Petersen, Miss K. O., On the Sources of the Nonnè Prestes Tale, Boston 1898. [Good detailed study.]

COMPLETE EDITIONS (in one volume).

- Skeat, W. W., The Student's Chaucer, Oxford 1895.
Pollard, A. W. (and others), The Works of Geoffrey Chaucer, Globe edition, London 1903.
Robinson, F. N., The Complete Works of Geoffrey Chaucer, Boston and London 1933.

STUDIES OF THE PERIOD.

- Jusserand, J. J., English Wayfaring Life in the Middle Ages, (transl. L. Toulmin Smith), London 1899; revised 1921.
Trevelyan, G. M., England in the Age of Wycliffe, London 1899; new edn. 1909.

CHAUCER'S PREDECESSORS.

- Ker, W. P., English Literature, Medieval, London 1912.
Sisam, K., and Tolkien, J. R. R., Fourteenth Century Verse and Prose, Oxford 1921, &c.

CRITICAL STUDIES OF CHAUCER.

- Dryden, John, Preface to his Fables, 1700. [The Nun's Priest's Tale is the second Fable.]
Kittredge, G. L., Chaucer and his Poetry, Cambridge (U.S.A.) and London 1915.
Legouis, E., Chaucer (transl. L. Lailavoix), London 1913.
Pollard, A. W., A Primer of Chaucer, London 1893, &c.
Lowes, J. L., Geoffrey Chaucer, London 1934.

¹ The bibliographical manuals cited give a full account of the great body of Chaucer criticism contained in special editions, monographs, and journals. As I have found it impossible to give specific references to such sources, I take this opportunity of making a general acknowledgement.

END OF THE MONK'S TALE

lines 737-76.

*This richè Cresus, whilom kyng of Lyde,
Of whichè Cresus Cirus soore hym dradde,
Yet was he caught amyddes al his pryde,
And to be brent men to the fyr hym ladde ; 740
But swich a reyn down fro the welkne shadde
That slow the fyr and made hym to escape ;
But to be war no gracè yet he hadde,
Til Fortune on the galwes made hym gape.*

*Whanne he escaped was, he kan nat stente 745
For to bigynne a newè werre agayn ;
He wendè wel, for that Fortúne hym sente
Swich hap that he escaped thurgh the rayn,
That of hise foos he myghtè nat be slayn ;
And eek a swevene upon a nyght he mette 750
Of which he was so proud and eek so fayn
That in vengeance he al his hertè sette.*

The Monkes Tale

*Upon a tree he was, as that hym thoughte, Ther Juppiter hym wessh bothe bak and syde,
 And Phebus eek a fair towaille hym broughte,* 755
*To drye hym with ; and therfore wax his pryde,
 And to his doghter that stood hym bisyde,
 Which that he knew in heigh sciënce habounde,
 He bad hire telle hym what it signyfyde,
 And she his drecm bigan right thus expounde :* 760

*' The tree,' quod she, ' the galwes is to meene,
 And Juppiter bitokneth snow and reyn,
 And Phebus with his towaille so clene—
 Tho been the sonnè stremes for to seyn.
 Thou shalt anhangd be, fader, certéyn :* 765
*Reyn shal thee wasshe, and sonnè shal thee drye.'
 Thus warned hym ful plat and ful pleyn
 His doghter, which that called was Phanyé.*

*Anhangd was Cresus the proudè kyng,
 His roial tronè myghte hym nat availle.* 770
*Tragedie is noon oother maner thyng,
 Ne kan in syngyng crie ne biwaille,
 Bút that Fortune alwey wole assaille
 With unwar strook the regnes that been proude ;
 For whan men trusteth hire, thanne wol she faille* 775
And covere hire brightè facè with a clowde.

Explicit Tragedia.

Heere stynteth the Knyght the Monk of his tale.

The Prologe of the NONNES PREESTES TALE.

‘HOO!’ quod the Knyght, ‘good sire, namoore of this!’

That ye han seyde is right ynough, ywis,
And muchel moore; for litel hevynesse
Is right ynough to muche folk, I gesse. (B 3960)

I seye for me, it is a greet disese, 5
Where as men han been in greet welthe and ese,
To heeren of hire sodeyn fal, alas!

And the contrarie is joye and greet solás,
As whan a man hath been in povre estaat,
And clymbeth up, and wexeth fortunat, 10
And there abideth in prosperitee:

Swich thyng is gladsom, as it thynketh me,
And of swich thyng were goodly for to telle.’

‘Ye,’ quod oure Hoost, ‘by seint Poules belle!
Ye seye right sooth. This Monk he clappeth lowde:
He spak, how “Fortune covered with a clowde”— 16
I noot nevere what—and also of a “Tragédie”

(Right now ye herde), and pardee, no remédie
It is for to biwaillé ne compleyne
That that is doon; and als it is a payne, 20
As ye han seyde, to heere of hevynesse.

The Prologe

Sire Monk, namoore of this, so God yow blesse!
 Youre tale anoyeth al this compaignye :
 Swich talkyng is nat worth a boterflye, (B 3980)
 For therinne is ther no desport ne game. 25

Wherefore sire Monk, daun Piers by youre name,
 I pray yow hertely, telle us somewhat elles,
 For sikerly, nere clynkyng of youre belles
 That on youre bridel hange on every syde,
 By hevene-kyng that for us allè dyde ! 30
 I sholde er this han fallen doun for sleep,
 Although the slough had never been so deep ;
 Thanne haddè youre tale al be toold in veyn :
 For, certainly, as that thise clerkes seyn,
 Where as a man may have noon audiènce, 35
 Noght helpeth it to tellen his sentènce.

And wel I woot the substance is in me,
 If any thyng shal wel reported be :
 Sire, sey somewhat of huntyng, I yow preye.
 'Nay,' quod this Monk, 'I have no lust to pleye ; 40
 Now lat another telle, as I have toold.'

Thanne spak oure Hoost, with rude speche and boold,
 And seyde unto the Nonnes Preest anon, (B 3999)
 'Com neer, thou preest, com hyder thou, sir John Telle us swich thyng as may oure hertes glade ; 45
 Be blithè, though thou ryde upon a jade ;
 What thogh thyn hors be bothè foul and lene ?
 If he wol serve thee, rekkè nat a bene !
 Looke that thyn herte be murie everemo.'

'Yis sire,' quod he, 'yis, Hoost, so moot I go ! 50
 But I be myrie, ywis I wol be blamed.'
 And right anon his tale he hath attamed,
 And thus he seyde unto us everichon,
 This sweetè preest, this goodly man, sir John.

Explicit.

Heere bigynneth

THE NONNES PREESTES TALE

OF THE COK AND HEN, CHAUNTECLEER AND PERTELOTE.

A POVRE wydwè, sondeel stape in age, 55
 Was whilom dwellyng in a narwe cotage Biside a grevè, stondynge in a dale. grove
 This wydwe, of which I tellè yow my tale,
 Syn thilkè day that she was last a wyf,
 In-paciènce ladde a ful symple lyf, 60
 For litel was hir catel and hir rente :
 By housbondrie of swich as God hire sente !
 She foond himself and eek hir doghtren two.
 Thre largè sowes haddè she and namo, (B 4020)
 Thre keen, and eek a sheep that hightè Malle 65
 Ful sooty was hir bour and eek hir halle,
 In which she eet ful many a sklendre meel :
 Of poynaunt sauce hir neded never a deel ;
 No deyntee morsel passed thurgh hir throte,
 Hir diete was accordant to hir cote ; 70
 Repleccioun ne made hire nevere sik,

Attempree diete was al hir phisik,
 And exercise, and hertes súffisaunce.
 The goutè lette hire nothyng for to daunce
 N'apoplexiè shentè nat hir heed. 75
 No wyn ne drank she, neither whit ne reed,
 Hir bord was served moost with whit and blak,—
 Milk and broun breed, in which she foond no lak,— Seynd bacoun, and somtyme an ey or tweye,
 For she was, as it were, a maner deye. 80

A yeerd she hadde, enclosed al aboute
 With stikkes and a dryè dych withoute,
 In which she hadde a Cok heet Chauntécleer :
 In al the land of crowyng nas his peer ; (B 4040)
 His ^{voys} was murier than the murie orgón 85
 On messèdayes that in the chirchè gon ;
 Wel sikerer ^{swar} was his crowyng in his logge
 Than is a klokke, or any abbéy orlogge :
 By nature he knew ech ascencioun
 Of the equynoxiál in thilkè toun, 90
 For whan degrees fiftene were ascended, Thanne crew he, that it myghte nat been amended.
 His coomb was redder than the fyn corál,
 And batailled as it were a castel wal ;
 His byle was blak and as the jeet it shoon, 95
 Lyk asure ^{pure} were hise legges and his toon, Hise nayles whitter than the lylýe flour,
 And lyk the burned gold was his colóur.\\
 This gentil cok hadde in his governaunce
 Sevene hennes, for to doon al his plesaunce, 100
 Whiche were hise sustres and his paramours,
 And wonder lyk to hym as of colours ;
 Of whiche the faireste hewed on hir throte
 Was cleped fairè damoysele Pertélote. (B 4060)

75 N'apoplexiè] Ne poplexie ne some MSS. 83 heet] highte ; that highte some MSS. 88 any] an MS. &c. 89 knew] crew MS.
 90 the omitted in some MSS. 91 weren MS.

Curteys she was, discreet and debonaire, 105

And compaignable, and bar hyrself so faire

Syn thilkè day that she was seven-nyght oold,

That trewely she hath the herte in hoold

Of Chauntécleer, loken in every lith:

He loved hire so that wel was hym therwith. 110

And swich a joye was it to here hem synge,

Whan that the brightè sonnè gan to sprynge,

In sweete accord, 'My lief is faren in londe':

For thilkè tyme, as I have understonde,

Beestes and briddes koudè speke and synge. 115

And so bifel that in a dawenyngè,

As Chauntécleer among hise wyves alle

Sat on his perchè, that was in the halle,

And next hym sat this fairè Pertélote,

This Chauntécleer gan gronen in his throte, 120

As man that in his dreem is drecched soore.

And whan that Pertélote thus herde hym roore,

She was agast, and seydè, 'Hertè deere,

What eyleth yow, to grone in this manère? (B 4080)

Ye been a verray slepere, fy, for shame!' 125

And he answerde and seydè thus, 'Madáme,

I pray yow that ye take it nat agrief:

By God, me mette I was in swich meschief

Right now, that yet myn herte is soore afright.

Now God,' quod he, 'my swevene recche aright 130

And kepe my body out of foul prisoun!

Me mette how that I romed up and down

Withinne oure yeerd, wheer as I saugh a beest

Was lyk an hound, and wolde han maad areest

Upon my body and han had me deed. 135

His colour was bitwixè yelow and reed,

And tipped was his tayl and bothe hise eeris

112 gan] bigan MS. &c. 116 a] the MS. 123 O herte MS.
128 mette] thoughte MS. 130 recche] rede some MSS. 135 han] wolde han some MSS.

With blak, unlyk the remenant of hise heeris ;
 His snowte ^{mouth} smal, with glowynge eyen, tweye ⁼
 Yet of his look for feere almoost I deye ! 140

This caused me my gronyng, doutélees.
 'Avoy !' quod she, 'Fy on yow, hertélees !
 Allas,' quod she, 'for, by that God above !
 Now han ye lost myn herte and al my love. (B 4100)
 I kan nat love a coward, by my feith ! 145

For certes, whatso any womman seith,
 We alle desiren, if it myghte bee,
 To han housbondes hardy, wise and free,
 And secree, and no nygard, ne no fool,
 Ne hym that is agast of every tool, 150
 Ne noon avauntour :—by that God above !
 How dorste ye seyn, for shame, unto youre love
 That any thyng myghte makè yow aferd ?
 Have ye no mannes herte, and han a berd ?

Allas ! and konne ye been agast of swevenys ? 155
 Nothyng, God woot ! but vanitee in swévene is.
 Swevenes engendren of replecciouns,
 And ofte of fume and of complecciouns,
 Whan humours been to habundant in a wight.

Certes this dreem which ye han met tonyght 160
 Comth of the grete superfluytee
 Of youre redè colera, pardee,
 Which causeth folk to dreden in hir dremes
 Of arwes, and of fyr with redè lemes ; (B 4120)
 Of redè beestes, that they wol hem byte ; 165
 Of conteks, and of whelpes grete and lyte ;
 Right as the humour of maléncolie Causeth ful many a man in sleep to crie
 For feere of blakè beres, or boles blake,
 Or elles blakè develes wol hem take. 170

161 comth] cometh MS. &c.: the grete] greet MS. 163 dreden]- dremen some MSS. 165 rede] grete MS. 169 of beres and of boles blake some MSS.

Of othere humours koude I telle also
That werken many a man in sleep ful wo,
But I wol passe as lightly as I kan.

Lo Catoun, which that was so wys a man,
Seyde he nat thus, "ne do no fors of dremes" 175

Now, sire,' quod she, 'whan we flee fro the bemes,
For goddes love, as taak som laxatyf

Up peril of my soule and of my lyf,
I conseilte yow the beste (I wol nat lye)
That bothe of colere and of malencolye 180

Ye purgè yow; and for ye shal nat tarie,
Though in this toun is noon apothecarie,
I shal myself to herbes techen yow (B 4139)

That shul been for youre heele and for youre prow: 185
And in oure yeerd tho herbes shal I fynde

The whiche han of hire propretee by kynde

To purgè yow, bynethe and eek above.

Foryet nat this, for Goddes owene love!

Ye been ful coleryk of compleccioun:

Ware the sonne in his ascencioun 190

Ne fynde yow nat repleet of humours hoot.

And if it do, I dar wel leye a grote

That ye shul have a fevere terciàne,

Or an agu that may be youre bane.

A day or two ye shul have digestyves 195

Of wormes, er ye take youre laxatyves

Of lawriol, centàure, and fumetère,

Or elles of ellèbor that groweth there,

Of katapucè, or of gaitrys berys,

Of herbe-yve growyng in oure yeerd ther mery is. 200

Pekke hem up right as they growe, and ete hem yn!

Be myrie, housbonde, for youre fader kyn!

Dredeth no dreem,—I kan sey yow namoore.' (B 4159)

'Madame,' quod he, 'graunt mercy of youre loore.

But nathêlees, as touchyng daun Catoun 205
 That hath of wysdom swich a greet renoun,
 Though that he ~~bad~~ ^{produced} no dremes for to drede,
 By God! men may in oldê bookes rede
 Of many a man moore of auctorité
 Than evere Caton was, so moot I thee! 210
 That ~~al~~ the révers seyn of his sentence,
 And han wel founden by experience
 That dremes been significaciouns
 As wel of joye as of tribulaciouns
 That folk enduren in this lif présent. 215
 Ther nedeth make of this noon argument:
 The verray preevê sheweth it in dede.
 —Oon of the gretteste auctour that men rede
 Seith thus: that whilom two felawes wente
 On pilgrimage in a ful good entente, 220
 And happed so they coomen in a toun,
 Wher as ther was swich congregacioun
 Of peple, and eek so streit of herbergage,
 That they ne founde as muche as o cotage (B 4180)
 In which they bothê myghte y-logged bee; 225
 Wherefore they mosten, of necessitee,
 As for that nyght departen compaignye,
 And ech of hem gooth to his hostelrye,
 And took his loggyng as it woldê falle:
 That oon of hem was logged in a stalle, 230
 Fer in a yeerd, with oxen of the plough;
 That oother man was logged wel ynough,
 As was his áventûre or his fortune,
 That us govérneth alle as in commûne.
 And so bifel that, longe er it were day, 235
 This man ~~mette~~ ^{dreant} in his bed, ther as he lay,
 How that his felawe gan upon hym calle,
 And seyde, "Allas, for in an oxes stalle

211 his] this MS.
 logged MS.

212 And] That MS.

225 y-logged]

This nyght I shal be mordred ther I lye!
Now help me, deerè brother, or I dye!
In allè hastè com to me!" he sayde. 240

This man out of his sleep for feere abrayde,
But whan that he was wakened of his sleep,
He turned hym and took of this no keep: (B 4200)
Hym thoughte his dreem nas but a vanitee. 245
Thus twies in his slepyng dremed hee,
And atte thriddè tyme yet his felawe
Cam, as hym thoughte, and seide, "I am now slawe:
Bihoold my bloody woundes, depe and wyde!
Arys up erly in the morwè-tyde,
And at the westgate of the toun," quod he,
"A cartè ful of donge ther shaltow se,
In which my body is hid ful prively:
Do thilkè carte arresten boldely.

My gold caused my mordre, sooth to sayn"— 255
And tolde hym every point how he was slayn,
With a ful pitous facè, pale of hewe.
And trustè wel, his dreem he foond ful trewe;
For on the morwe, as soone as it was day,
To his felawes in hē took the way, 260
And whan that he cam to this oxes stalle,
After his felawe he bigan to calle.

The hostiler answèrede hym anon,
And seyde, "Sire, youre felawe is agon; (B 4220)
As soone as day he wente out of the toun." 265

This man gan fallen in suspecidoun,
Remembrynge on hise dremes that he mette,
And forth he gooth—no lenger wolde he lette—Unto the westgate of the toun, and fond
A dōng-carte, as it were to dongè lond. 270
That was arrayed in that samè wise
As ye han herd the dedè man devyse;

244 this] it MS. 263 answerde MS. &c. 266 falle in gret s.
some MSS. 270 wente as it were some MSS.; as he wente others.

And with an hardy herte he gan to crye :
 Vengeance and justice of this felonye :
 " My felawe mordred is this samè nyght,
 And in this carte heere he lith ^{lyth} gapyng upright ! 275
 I crye out on the ministres," quod he,
 " That sholden kepe and reulen this citée !
 Harrow ! alas ! heere lith my felawe slayn !"
 What sholde I moore unto this talè sayn ? 280
 The peple out-sterter and caste the cart to grounde,
 And in the myddel of the dong they founde
 The dedè man, that mordred was al newe.

O blisful God, that art so just and trewe, (B 4240)
 Lo, how that thou biwreyest mordre alway ! 285
 Mordre wol out, that se we day by day.
 Mordre is so wlatson and abhomynable
 To God, that is so just and resonable,
 That he ne wol nat suffre it heled be,— Though it abyde a yeer, or two, or thre : 290
 Mordre wol out, this my conclusioun.
 And right anon ministres of that toun
 Han hent the cartere and so soore hym pynded,
 And eek the hostiler so soore engýned,
 That they biknewe hire wikkednesse anon, 295
 And were anhangid by the nekkè-bon.

Heere may men seen that dremes been to drede !
 And certes, in the samè book I rede,
 Right in the nextè chapitre after this (I gabbè nat, so have I joye or blis !) :— 300
 ¶ Two men that wolde han ^{wanting} passed over see,
 For certeyn cause, into a fèr contrée,
 If that the wynd ne haddè been contrárie,
 That made hem in a citee for to tarie (B 4260)
 That stood ful myrie upon an haven-syde : 305
 But on a day, agayn the even-tyde,

The wynd gan chaunge and blew right as hem leste.
Jolif and glad they wente unto hir reste,
And casten hem ful erly for to saille.

But (herkneþ!) to that o man fil a greet mervaille.
That oon of hem, in slepyng as he lay, 311
Hym mette a wonder dreem, agayn the day:—
Hym thoughte a man stood by his beddes syde
And hym comanded that he sholde abyde,
And seyde hym thus, "If thou tomorwe wende, 315
Thow shalt be dreynt—my tale is at an ende."

He wook and tolde his felawe what he mette,
And preyede hym his viage to lette, ~~he~~ ^{he} ~~gyn~~
As for that day he preyede hym to byde.

His felawe, that lay by his beddes syde, 320
Gan for to laughe and scorned hym ful faste.
"No dreem," quod he, "may so myn herte agaste
That I wol lette for to do my thynges.
I sette nat a straw by thy dremynges, (B 4280)
For swevenes been but vanytees and japes: 325

Men dreme alday of owles or of apes,
And of many a mazen therewithal; ^{fanies}
Men dreme of thyng that nevere was, ne shal.
But sith I see that thou wolt heere abyde,
And thus forslawthen wilfully thy tyde, 330
God woot, it reweth me, and have good day."
And thus he took his leve ^{leave} and wente his way.
But er that he hadde half his cours y-seyled,
Noot I nat why, ne what myschaunce it eyled,
But casuelly the shippes botme rente, 335
And ship and man under the water wente,
In sighte of othere shippes it bisyde ^{at}
That with hem seyled at the same tyde.
And therefore, faire Pertelote so deere,

308 wenten unto reste some MSS.
lette some MSS. 319 preyede MS. &c.

318 preyede MS. &c.: for to 338 hem] hym some MSS.

By swiche ensamples oldē maistow leere 340
 That no man sholdē been to recchelees ;
 Of dremes, for I seye thee, doutelees,
 That many a dreem ful soore is for to drede.

¶ Lo, in the lyf of Seint Kenelm I rede, (B 4300)
 That was Kenulphus sone, the noble kyng 345
 Of Mercenrike, how Kenelm mette a thyng.

A lite er he was mordred, on a day,
 His mordre in his avysidoun he say.
 His norice hym expowned every deel
 His swevene, and bad hym for to kepe hym weel 350

For traisoun ; but he nas but seven yeer oold,
 And therfore litel talē hath he toold
 Of any dreem, so hooly was his herte.

By God ! I haddē levere than my sherte
 That ye hadde had his legende, as have I. 355

Dame Pertelote, I sey you trewely, Macrobeus, that writ the Avisidoun
 In Affrike of the worthy Cipidoun, Affermeth dremes, and seith that they been Warnynge of thynges that men after seen. 360

And forthermoore, I pray yow, looketh wel
 In the Oldē Testament of Daniël,
 If he heeld dremes any vanitee.

Reed eek of Joseph, and ther shul ye see (B 4320)
 Wher dremes be somtyme (I sey nat alle) 365
 Warnynge of thynges that shul after falle.

Looke of Egipte the kyng, daun Pharaō,
 His bakere and his butiller also,
 Wher they ne feltē noon effect in dremes !
 Whoso wol seken actes of sondry remes 370
 May rede of dremes many a wonder thyng :—

Lo Cresus, which that was of Lydē kyng, Mette he nat that he sat upon a tree,

of the Cok and the Fox

Which signified he sholde anhangd bee?

Lo here ^{hear} Andromacha, Ectóres wyf, 375

That day that Ector sholdè lèse his lyf

She dremed on the samè nyght biforn

How that the lyf of Ector sholde be lorn

If thilkè day he wente into batáille. ✓

She warnèd hym, but it myghte nat availle: it 380

He wentè for to fightè nathèles, ^{that day}

But he was slayn anon ^{by} Achilles.

But thilkè tale is al to longe to telle,

And eek it is ^{nyght} hy day,—I may nat dwelle. (B 4340)

Shortly I seye, as for conclusioun, 385

That I shal han of this avisioun

Adversitee; and I seye forthermoor

That I ^{ne} ~~telle~~ ^{of} laxatyves no stoor,

For they been venymes, I woot it weel;

I hem diffye, I love hem never a deel.

Now lāt us speke of myrthe and stynte al this.

Madámè Pertélote, so have I blis! ^{generous stop}

Of o thyng God hath sent me large grace,

For whan I se the beautee of youre face, (B 4350)

Ye been so scarlet-reed aboute youre eyen, 395

It maketh al my drede ^{for} to dyen.

For, al so siker as In principio,

Mulier est hominis confusio:

Madame, the sentence of this Latyn is, (B 4355)

“Womman is mannes joye and al his blis.”. . . 400

I am so ful of joye and of solás

That I diffyè bothè swevene and dreem.’ (B 4360)

And with that word he fly doun fro the beem,

(For it was day) and eke hise hennes alle,

And with a ^{chuk} he gan hem for to calle,

For he hadde founde a corn lay in the yerd.

Real he was, he was namoore aferd: . . . 410

— ^{royal, kindly} 375 Andromacha MS. &c.

389 venymous some MSS.

383 tale om. MS.: for to telle MS.

406 fly] fleigh; fley other MSS.

He looketh as it were a grym leóun,
 And on hise toos he rometh up and down,—
 Hym deigned nat to sette his foot to grounde. 415
 He chukketh whan he hath a corn y-founde,
 And to hym rennen thanne hise wyves alle.
 Thus, ^{royal} real as a prince is in his halle, Leve I this Chauntecleer in his pastúre,
 And after wol I telle his áventüre. 420

Whan that the monthe in which the world bigan,
 That highte March, whan God first makéd man, Wás compleet, and passed were also (Syn March bigan) thritty dayes and two, (B 4380)
 Bifel that Chauntecleer in al his pryde, 425
 Hise sevene wyves walkynge hym bisyde,
 Caste up hise eyen to the brighte sonne
 That in the signe of Taurus hadde y-ronne
 Twenty degrees and oon and somewhat moore,
 And knew by kynde^{nature}, and by noon oother loore, 430
 That it was pryme, and crew with blisful stevene.
 ‘The sonne^{sun}, he seyde, ‘is clomben up on hevене
 Fourty degrees and oon and moore, ywis.
 Madamé Pertelote, my worldes blis,
 Herkneþ this blisful briddes how they synge^{sing}, 435
 And se^{see} the fresshe floures how they sprynge!
 Ful is myn herte of revch and solas.^{comfort}
 But sodeynly hym fil a sorweful cas.^{woe}
 For evere the latter ende of joy is wo: ^{gone}
 God woot that worldly joye is soone ago! 440
 And if a rethor^{historian} koude laide endite,
 He in a cronycle saunly myghte it write
 As for a sovereyn notabilitee.
 Now every wys man, lat him herkne me: (B 4400)
 This storic is al so trewe, I undertake, 445

418 real] roial MS. &c.: his] an MS. &c.
 syde MS. 442 cronique some MS.

426 hym bisyde] by his

As is the book of Launcelot de Lake
 That wommen holde in ful greet reverence.
 Now wol I ^{turn} torne agayn to my sentence.
 A ^{black} colfox, ful of sly iniquitee, ^{malice}
 That in the grove hadde woned yeres three, 450
 By heigh ymaginacioun forncast,
 The samè nyght thurghout the hegges brast
 Into the yerd ther Chauntecleer the faire
 Was wont, and eek hise wyves, to repaire;
 And in a bed of wortes ^{hote} stille he lay 455
 Til it was passed undren of the day,
 Waitynge his tyme on Chauntecleer to falle,—
 As gladly doon thise homycides alle
 That in await ligen to mordre men.
 O falsè mordreour, lurkyng in thy dep! 460
 O newè Scariot! newè Genyloun!
 Falsè dissymulour, O Greek Synoun
 That broghtest Troye al outrèly to sorwe!
 O Chauntecleer, acursed be that morwe (B 4420)
 That thou into that yerd flaugh fro the bemes! 465
 Thou were ful wel y-warned by thy dremes
 That thilkè day was perilous to thee.
 But what that God forwoot moot nedes bee,
 After the opinioun of certein clerks;
 Witnesse on hym that any ^{parfit} clerk is 470
 That in scole is greet altercacioun
 In this matèere, and greet disputioun,
 And hath been of an hundred thousand men.
 But I ne kan nat bulge it to the bren,
 As kan the hooly doctour Agustyn, 475
 Or Boece or the Bisshop Bradwardyn:—
 Wheither that Goddes worthy forwityng Streyneth me nedely for to doon a thyng,

448 torne] come MS.
 478 nedely for] nedefully MS.

465 that(2nd)] the some MSS.

(Nedely clepe I symple necessitee);
 Or elles if free choys be graunted me 480
 To do that samè thyng or do it noght,
 Though God forwoot it er that it was wrought;
 Or if his wityng streyneth never a deel
 But by necessitee condicioncel,— (B 4440)
 I wol nat han to do of swich matéere: 485
 My tale is of a cok, as ye may heere,
 That took his conseil of his wyf with sorwe
 To walken in the yerd upon that morwe
 That he hadde met the dreem that I yow tolde.
 ‘Wommennes conseils been ful oftè colde;’ 490
 Wommannes conseil broghte us first to wo;
 And made Adám fro^{Paradyse} Paradyse to go,
 Ther as he was ful myrie and wel at ese.
 But for I noot to whom it myght displese
 If I conséil of wommen woldè blame, 495
 Passe over, for I seyde it in my game.
 Rede auctours where they trete of swich matéere,
 And what they seyn of wommen ye may heere.
 Thisen been the cokkes wordes and nat myne:
 I kan noon harm of no womman divyne. 500

Faire in the soond to bathe hire myrily Lith Pertelote, and alle hire sūstres by,
 Agayn the sonne; and Chauntecleer so free
 Soong murier than the mermayde in the see (B 4460)
 (For Phisiologus seith sikerly 505
 How that they syngen wel and myrily).

And so bifel that as he caste his eye
 Among the wortes on a boterflye,
 He was war of this fox that lay ful lowe.
 Nothyng ne liste hym thannè for to crowe, 510
 But cride anon, ‘cok! cok!’ and up he sterte,

489 the] that MS.: yow] of MS. 492 fro] out of MS. 496 seyde] seye MS. 500 of] on some MSS.

As man that was affrayed in his herte ;
 For naturcelly a beest desireth flee
 Fro his contrarie, if he may it see,
 Though he never erst hadde seyn it with his eye. 515

This Chauntecleer, whan he gan hym espye,
 He wolde han fled, but that the fox anon
 Seyde, 'Gentil sire, allas, wher wol ye gon?
 Be ye affrayed of me that am youre frend?
 Now certes I were worsè than a feend 520
 If I to yow wolde harm or vileynye.

I am nat come youre conseil for t'espye,
 But trewely the cause of my comynge
 Was oonly for to herkne how that ye synge ; (B 448o)
 For trewely ye have as myrie a stevene 525
 As any aungel hath that is in hevene.

Therwith ye han in musyk moore feelynge
 Than hadde Boèce, or any that kan synge.
 My lord youre fader (God his soule blesse!)
 And eek youre mooder, of hire gentillesse 530
 Han in myn hous y-been, to my greet ese ;
 And certes, sire, ful fayn wolde I yow plesce.

But for men speke of syngyng, I wol seye,
 So moote I broukè wel myne eyen tweye!
 Save yow, I herdè nevere man so synge 535
 As didè youre fader in the morwènyng.
 Certes it was of herte al that he song!

And for to make his voys the moore strong
 He wolde so peyne hym that with bothe hise eyen
 He mostè wynke, so loude he woldè cryen, 540
 And stonden on his tiptoon therwithal,
 And strecchè forth his nekkè, long and smal
 And eek he was of swich discrecioun
 That ther nas no man in no regioun (B 45co)
 That hym in song or wisdom myghtè passe. 545

526 hath] om. MS. 533 wol] wol yow MS. 535 herdè I MS.
 535 so] yet MS.

I have wel rad in daun Burnel the Asse,
 Among hise vers, how that ther was a cok, Fór a preestes sone yaf hym a knock
 Upon his leg, whil he was yong and nyce,
 He made hym for to lese his benefice. 550
 But certeyn ther nys no comparisoun
 Bitwixe the wisdom and discrecioun
 Óf youre fader, and of his subtiltee.
 Now syngeth, sire, for seinté charitee!
 Lat se konne ye youre fader countrefete.' 555

This Chauntécleer hise wynges gan to bete,
 As man that koude his traysoun nat espie,
 So was he ravysshed with his flaterie.

(Allas, ye lordes! many a fals flatour
 Is in youre court, and many a losengeour, 560
 That plesen yow wel moore, by my feith,
 Than he that soothfastnesse unto yow seith.
 Redeth Ecclesiaste of Flaterye; ecclesiast Beth war, ye lordes, of hir trecherye!) (B 4520)

This Chauntécleer stood hye upon his toos, 565
 Strecchyng his nekke, and heeld hise eyen cloos,
 And gan to crowe loudé for the nones;
 And daun Russell the fox stirte up at ones
 And by the gargat henté Chauntécleer, seig
 And on his bak toward the wode hym beer, 570
 For yet ne was ther no man that hym sewed.

O Destinee, that mayst nat been eschewed!
 Allas, that Chauntécleer fleigh fro the bemes!
 Allas, his wyf ne roghté nat of dremes!
 And on a Friday fil al this meschaunce. 575

O Venus, that art goddesse of plesaunce, vernal
 Syn that thy servant was this Chauntécleer,
 And in thy servyce dide al his poweer,
 Moore for delit than world to multiplie,
 Why woldestow suffre hym on thy day to dye? 580

wilt thou

548 for that MS.

560 courtes MS.

O Gaufred, deerè maister sovèrayn,
 That whan thy worthy kyng Richard was slayn
 With shot, compleynedest his deeth so soore,
 Why ne hadde I now thy sentence and thy loore.
 The Friday for to chide, as diden ye? 585
 (For on a Friday, soothly, slayn was he). (B 4542)
 Thanne wolde I shewe yow how that I koude pleyne
 For Chauntecleres drede and for his peyne.

Certes, swich cry ne lamentacioun
 Was nevere of ladyes maad whan Ylioun 590
 Was wonne, and Pirrus with his strecite swerd
 Whan he hadde hent kyng Priam by the berd
 And slayn hym (as seith us Eneydos),
 As maden alle the hennes in the clos
 Whan they had seyn of Chauntecleer the sighte. 595
 But sovèreinly dame Pertelotè shrighte, shrighte
 Ful louder than dide Hasdrubales wyf
 Whan that hir housbonde haddè lost his lyf,
 And that the Romainys haddè brend Cartage—
 She was so ful of torment and of rage 600
 That wilfully into the fyr she sterte
 And brende hirselves with a stedefast herte.

O woful hennes, right so criden ye,
 As, whan that Nero brendè the citée (B 4560)
 Of Romè, cryden senatoures wyves 605
 For that hir husbondes losten alle hir lyves:
 Withouten gilt this Nero hath hem slayn.
 Now wol I turnè to my tale agayn.
 ¶ This sely wydwe and eek hir doghtres two Herden thise hennes crie and maken wo, 610
 And out at dores stirten they anon,
 And syen the fox toward the grovè gon,
 And bar upon his bak the cok away,
 And cryden, 'Out! harrow! and weylaway!

596 sovèreinly] sodeynly MS. 605 senatours MS.; the senatours some MSS. 608 turne I wole MS. 609 This] The some MSS.

Ha! ha! the fox! and after hym they ran, 615
 And eek with staves many another man :
 Ran Colleoure dogge, and Talbot, and Gerland,
 And Malkyn, with a dystaf in hir hand ;
 Ran cow and calf, and eek the verray hogges,
 Sóre aferd for berkyng of the dogges 620
 And shoutyng of the men and wommen eek,—
 They ronné so hem thoughte hir hertè breek ;
 They yelleden as feendes doon in helle ;
 The dokes cryden, as men wolde hem quelle ; (B 4580)
 The gees for feerè flowen over the trees ; 625
 Out of the hyvè cam the swarm of bees,
 So hydous was the noyse, a benedictee !
 Certes, he Jakkè Straw and his meynée
 Ne madè nevere shoutes half so shille
 Whan that they wolden any Flemyng kille, 630
 As thilkè day was maad upon the fox.
 Of bras they broghten bemes and of box,
 Of horn, of boon, in whiche they blewe and powped,
 And therwithal they skriked and they howped.
 It semed as that hevene sholdè falle ! 635
 Now, goodè men, I prey yow, herkneth alle.

Lo, how Fortúnè turneth sodeynly
 The hope and pryde eek of hir enemy !
 This cok, that lay upon the foxes bak,
 In al his drede unto the fox he spak 640
 And seyde, ‘Sire, if that I were as ye,
 Yet sholde I seyn, as wys God helpè me !
 “Turneth agayn, ye proudè cherles alle ;
 A verray pestilence upon yow falle ! (B 4600)
 Now I am come unto this wodes syde, 645
Maugree youre heed the cok shal heere abyde ;
I wol hym ete, in feith, and that anon.”

619 eek om. MS. 620 sore aferd] so fered MS. (see note).
 622 They] The MS. 623 yollenden MS. 629 shille] shrille some MSS.
 634 skriked] shriked some MSS. 638 eek om. MS.
 642 sholde] wolde MS. 645 this] the MS.

The fox answerde, 'In feith, it shal be don.'—
 And as he spak that word, al sodeynly
 This cok brak from his mouth delyverly, 650
 And heighe upon a tree he fleigh anon.
 And whan the fox saugh that he was ygon,
 'Allas!' quod he, 'O Chauntecleer, alas!
 I have to yow,' quod he, 'y-doon trespas,
 In as muche as I maked yow aferd 655
 Whan I yow hente and broght out of the yerd:
 But, sire, I dide it in no wikke entente;
 Com doun, and I shal telle yow what I mente;
 I shal seye sooth to yow, God help me so!'
 'Nay, thanne,' quod he, 'I shrewe us bothè two, 660
 And first I shrewe myself, bothè blood and bones,
 If thou bigyle me any ofter than ones.
 Thou shalt namoorè thurgh thy flaterye
 Do me to synge and wynkè with myn eye; (B 4620)
 For he that wynketh whan he sholdè see, 665
 Al wilfully, God lat him nevere thee!'
 'Nay,' quod the fox, 'but God yeve hym meschaunce
 That is so undiscreet of governaunce ✓
 That jangleth whan he sholdè holde his pees!'
 'Lo, swich it is for to be recchêles 670
 And necligent, and truste on flaterye!
 But ye that holden this tale a solye
 As of a fox, or of a cok and hen,
 Tâketh the moralité, goode men;
 For seint Poul seith that al that writen is 675
 To oure doctrine it is y-write, ywis:
 Tâketh the fruyt and lat the chaf be stille.
 Now goodè God, if that it be thy wille,
 As seith my lord, so make us alle goode men,
 And brynge us to his heighè blisse. Amen. 680

Heere is ended the Nonnes Preestes tale.

652 ygon] gon MSS. except Harl. 7334.
 MS. and some others. 657 in] of MS.
 675 Poul] Paul MS.

656 out of the] into this 662 any om. some MSS.

The prologue of the cronicles greetes talor.
Too quod the knyght good ope namore this that ye han seyd is right ynough ydis and mychel more for lites heynesse as right ynough to unthe faste 7 esse 7 oye for me it is a greet dysse as ye as men han been in greet selthe and so to kepen of hys oodeyn far allas and the courtshipe is ioye and greet solas as ashan a man hath been in poure estat

NOTES

The Monk's Tale

M. T. 737 Cresus . . . Lyde: Croesus, King of Lydia in Asia Minor, reputed to be the richest of men, was finally conquered by the Persians under Cyrus in 546 B.C. According to Herodotus, i. 87, he was saved by rain and spared by Cyrus. Chaucer's version comes from the Roman de la Rose (ed. Langlois, vol. iii, ll. 6489 ff.), but not from the part that Chaucer translated. The Roman in turn draws on the Speculum Historiale iii. 17, compiled by Vincent of Beauvais (d. 1264), or on the mythographical collections which are Vincent's source. Cp. Chaucer's translation of Boethius de Consolatione Philosophiae bk. ii, prose 2:—Wystestow nat how Cresus, kyng of Lydyens, of whiche kyng Cirus was ful sore agast a lytil byforn,—that this rewliche Cresus was caught of Cirus and lad to the fyre to ben brend; but that a rayn descendede down fro hevene that rescowyde hym.

M. T. 738 hym dradde: 'feared for himself'; 'dread' is commonly reflexive in early English.

M. T. 741 f swich a reyn . . . That: modern English uses 'such . . . as' or 'such . . . that it'.

M. T. 743 'But still he had not the grace to be cautious', where grace = 'divine favour': it was not granted him to learn caution.

M. T. 745 f. he kan nat stente For to begynne: 'he cannot refrain from beginning'. Chaucer's choice between for to and to is usually governed by metrical convenience.

M. T. 750 he mette: 'he dreamed'; OE. mætan distinct from OE. mētan 'to meet'. Mætan is both personal, as here, and impersonal, as in me mette ll. 128, 132, &c. Cp. note to l. 12 below.

M. T. 753 as that hym thoughte: 'as it seemed to him'; see note to l. 12 below. Observe Chaucer's free use of compound connectives, which give ease and flow to his verse: as that = as; which that 'who' 758, 768; what that 'what' 468; wher(e) as 'where' 6; 133; ther as 'where' 236; whan that 'when' 112, 122; er that 'before' 333; syn that 'since' 577; though that 'though' 207; if that 'if' 303; how that 'how' 237.

M. T. 753 ff. Herodotus iii. 124 says that the daughter of Poly-crates, another ruler famous for his prosperity, had such a dream before her father's murder (522 B. C.) (Times Lit. Suppl. 26 June 1924). The stories seem to have been fused in the Middle Ages.

M. T. 757-9 to his doghter . . . he bad hire: a broken construction: command, which might have been used instead of bad, can be used with either construction.

M. T. 760 bigan . . . expounde: 'expounded'; cp. note to l. 307.

M. T. 761 is to meene: 'means'—the inflected infinitive, e. g. is to mēnanne, has the same use in Old English.

M. T. 762 Juppiter: Jupiter as the god of rain and storm.

M. T. 764 Tho been . . . for to seyn: 'they express' or 'signify'; cp. note to l. 761.

M. T. 767 The metre is halting. If emendation is needed, the addition of eek 'also' after and does not harm a flat line.

M. T. 768 Phanyé: 'Phanie sa fille' in Roman de la Rose. I suspect that this unclassical name is due to misreading of a flourished m as ph in a MS.; cp. Vincent of Beauvais:—quod cum filiae suae mane indicasset (mane 'at dawn' misread as phane, and interpreted as a proper name in apposition to filiac.)

M. T. 771 ff. 'Tragedy is nothing but this; nor can (Tragedy) lament and bewail in song (i. e. tragic verse) (anything) except (this): that Fortune &c.' Cp. Chaucer's Boethius, bk. ii, prose 2. 'What other thyng bywaylen the crynges of tragedyes but oonly the dedes of Fortune, that with unwar strook overturneth the realmes of greet nobleye?'; and the gloss thereon 'Tragedye is to seyn a dité of a prosperité for a tyme, that endeth in wrecchid-nesse'.

The Nun's Priest's Tale

1 ff. The Monk is a man of rank, and so it falls to the Knight, the chief of the company and the most courteous, to interrupt him. But there is some evidence that in the form of the Prologue without ll. 5-24 (see note to l. 16 ff.), the Host, not the Knight, was originally the interrupter.

1. Chaucer often repeats an expression that was common in the colloquial use of his time:—the Knight stops a quarrel between the Host and the Pardoner with 'Namore of this, for it is right ynough' (C. 962); in the Knight's Tale Theseus twice parts Palamon and Arcite with 'Ho! namore'; and Criseyde in Troilus iv, 1242 cries 'But ho! for we han right ynough of this.'

2-5 'What you have said is quite enough indeed, and much more (than enough); for a little sadness is quite enough for many people, I am sure. For my part, I say it is very painful' &c.

12 swich thyng: so ll. 13, 45. This is the old construction; but such a thing appears early in Middle English; and such things has since taken its place in most uses.

it thynketh me: 'it seems to me'. The impersonal verb OE. þyncan 'to seem' became in many ME. forms indistinguishable from the personal verb, OE. þencan 'to think'. Chaucer still preserves several impersonal constructions which were lost in later English, e.g. hym thoughte 245, 248, 313; hir neded 68; hem leste 'it pleased them' (OE. lystan), ne liste hym 510; hym deigned 415 (here a French verb takes the construction); it reweth me 331 'I am sorry' (here it serves as a subject); cp. note to Monk's Tale 750 above. The loss of impersonal constructions is due to the dropping of inflexions in the noun. Thus in l. 346 Old English would have Cēnhelm mætte if the construction were personal, but Cēnhelme (dat.) mætte if it were impersonal. In Middle English the dative inflexion is lost except in pronouns; Kenelm mette may be either personal or impersonal; and as most verbs are personal, the small class of impersonals tends to disappear.

14 Seinte Poules belle: The ME. form Poul(e) is from Old French Pol; the modern Paul takes its spelling directly from Latin Paulus; cp. note to l. 675. While the city was still small (at this time its population was about 40,000), Old St. Paul's was a centre of civic life in a way that the modern cathedral cannot be. All the citizens would be within sound of its great bell, which was their common bell. So as early as the reign of Edward II they objected to the walling in of the eastern part of the churchyard, claiming it 'to be the place of assembly to their folkmothes, and that the great steeple there scituate was to that use, their common bell, which being there rung, al the inhabitants of the citie might heare and come together' (Stowe Survey of London, ed. Kingsford, i, p. 325). There is a certain appropriateness in the reference, for Chaucer himself, the Host, Pardoner, Manciple, Cook, and others, lived in or near the city.

16 ff. He refers to the last line of the Monk's Tale, and then to l. 771 ff. But this is begging a question:—

MSS. which end with Croesus have the tragedies in this order: Zenobia, Peter of Spain, Peter of Cyprus, Bernabo Visconti, Ugolino of Pisa, Nero, Holofernes, Antiochus, Alexander, Julius Caesar, Croesus. But the Ellesmere and other good MSS. have the four medieval stories (italicized) after Croesus. Defenders of the latter order explain, over-ingeniously, that the Host was drowsing (cp.

l. 31), and that his last recollections are of Croesus, some 100 lines before the Knight's interruption! Observe that all the references to Croesus are in ll. 5-24, which are not in MSS. like Corpus and Hengwrt. It has been argued (see Miss Hammond's Bibliography, pp. 241 ff.) that in its first state Chaucer's text did not contain these lines, and certainly there is nothing to account for their omission by accident. Perhaps the MSS. give confusedly two states of the text, both due to Chaucer: (i) Monk's Tale ending with Ugolino; Prologue without ll. 5-24; (ii) Monk's Tale ending with Croesus, and the much livelier Prologue containing the Host's jesting references, for which the moving tale of Ugolino gave no opportunity. It is hard now to judge the effect of the Prologue as if ll. 5-24 had never been written; but when they are absent l. 42 has more meaning, for the Host's 'rude speech and bold' then appears for the first time. Chaucer may have felt that to stop the tale immediately after the story of Ugolino, which is a masterpiece, was inartistic; and that there was better ground for interruption if the Monk, after his modern examples which promised a speedy end to the series, wandered back to early Greek legend.

18 no remédie: Skeat took this as an echo of the Monk's opening lines:

'I wol biwaille in manere of Tragédie . . .

And fillen so that ther nas no remédie.

But there remédie has quite a different sense. It is used in both places independently as a handy rime to tragédie.

23 anoyeth: 'wearies' or 'is distasteful to'.

26 daun Piers by youre name: the circumlocution is not intended to be comic; cp. the Doctor's tale of Appius and Virginia (l. 213): 'Doghter' quod he 'Virginia by thy name'.

Daun, Dan = 'sir', Latin dominus; another form Dom is still used in addressing a monk. Chaucer also uses it as a respectful title for distinguished persons of antiquity, e.g. daun Pharaon 367; and, playfully, daun Russell 568.

Piers is the French form of Peter, as in Piers Plowman and the modern surname Pierce, Pearse, &c. In the preamble to the Monk's Tale, the Host says he does not know the Monk's name:

But by my trouthe I knowe nat youre name,—

Wher shal I callé you my lord daun John,

Or daun Thomas, or elles daun Albon?

28 nere clynkyng &c.: 'were it not for the clinking' &c. Cp. the description of the Monk in the Prologue:

And whan he rood men myghte his brydel heere

Gynglen in a whistlynge wynd als cleere

And eek as loude as dooth the chapel belle, &c.

It has been noted (Introduction, § iv, end) that the frame of the Canterbury Tales is not very intimately connected with the stories; but the links are closely joined with the general Prologue, and probably most of the frame was written about the same time. See note to l. 37 ff.

32 Medieval roads were not good, and a rider in spring time had to pick his way through the mud-holes. There is another reference to the 'slough' in the preamble to the Manciple's Tale, when the drunken Cook falls off his horse:

34 thise clerkes: a common Middle English use of the demonstrative this, these, which does not imply that the 'clerkes' are particularized. We should say 'the learned'.

35 f. The Vulgate Bible has 'Ubi auditus non est non effundas sermonem' (Ecclus. xxxii. 6), which Chaucer translates in his tale of Melibeus: 'Ther as thou ne mayst have noon audience, enforce thee nat to speke' (B 2237); explaining: 'he that precheth to hem that listen nat heeren his wordes, his sermon hem anoieth'.

37 ff. 'And I know well that I have in me the stuff <of a good listener> if a thing is well told'. This leads up to the next line—if the Monk will tell some hunting story he will not find the Host unappreciative. The Monk's qualifications as a hunter are referred to in the Prologue, 178, 198 ff.

43 the Nonnes Preest: one of the three priests (Prol. 164) in attendance on the First Nun, i.e. the Prioress. Some prefer the form Nonne Preest, in which Nonne is the historical gen. sg. fem. < OE. nunnan; but by Chaucer's time the declension could follow the masculine nouns with a genitive in -es. There is no description of this Priest in the Prologue, but a few inferior MSS. contain an unfinished speech of the Host, which serves as Epilogue to the Nun's Priest's Tale and seems to be of Chaucer's own drafting. The following lines from it indicate that he was of the same brawny, florid, well-fed type as the Monk and the Friar; and give point to the Host's remarks about the wretched horse that had to carry him:

Se whiché braunes hath this gentil Preest,
So gret a nekke, and swich a largé breest!
He loketh as a sperhauke with hise eyen!
Him nedeth nat his colour for to dyghen
With brasile ne with greyn of Portyngalé!
Now, sire, faire fallé yow for youre tale.

44. neer: 'nearer', still a true comparative of nigh.

sir John: an old nickname for a priest, who was properly addressed as sir. Here it appears to be a real name, cp. l. 54.

Note that few of the pilgrims are given surnames, which were a comparatively late development. Harry Bailly the Host, and Chaucer himself are exceptions.

47. The reference to the Nun's Priest's scraggy horse may seem to be irrelevant; but it is introduced to make the picture sharp, and also implies that the Priest had to bear a good deal of chaff from his fellow-pilgrims because of his wretched mount. Chaucer had an eye for horses: the Knight's were 'goode' (Prol. 74), the Monk's 'in greet estaat' (Prol. 203), the Clerk's nag was 'as leene as is a rake' (287); the Shipman 'rood upon a rouncy, as he kouthe' (390); the Wife of Bath 'upon an ambler' (469); the Plowman 'upon a mere' (541); the Reeve 'upon a ful good stot, That was al pomely grey, and highte Scot' (615); the Canon, who caught up the pilgrims at Boughton-under-Blee, had a horse of the same colour, sweating so 'that it wonder was to see'; and his Yeoman's horse was 'of foom al flekked as a pye' (Canon Yeoman's Preamble).

50 so moot I go!: in early use go is frequently used in the narrow sense 'walk' (see the juxtaposition to ride in the sixth verse quoted in the note to l. 113). Hence 'so may I go!' = 'so may I enjoy the use of my legs', and is exactly parallel to l. 534 (see note).

55 somdeel stape in age: somewhat advanced in age', 'well on in years'; stapen in age occurs in Merchant's Tale, E 1514; and stept in age (years) is common in Elizabethan English.

57 greve: OE. has both græf > ME. greve, and gräf > ME. grove, l. 450. Chaucer's rimes show greve only. This is the wood of the Roman de Renart; cp. ll. 570, 645 below.

59 Syn thilké day, &c.: a mere formula for 'since her husband died', with no implication that she had had more than one husband.

61 'for her property and her revenues were small'. In the Prologue 373 it is said of the burgesses: 'For catel hadde they ynogh and rente'. Catel (modern cattle) and chattel are the Northern French and the Parisian French forms of the same word, Latin capitale 'principal', 'property'. In the sixteenth century catel was more and more restricted to live-stock, and from that time chattel came into use in the legal sense of movable possessions.

62 'By careful management of such goods as God sent her she provided for (foond) herself, and her two daughters also.'

64 and namo: These empty phrases are very handy for rime-making. Chaucer uses them less in the rimed couplet than in the more difficult stanza forms; but he takes little pains to disguise his tags. Many of the oaths and asseverations serve this purpose, e.g. by that God above 143, 151; pardee 162; for Goddes owene love 188; for seinte charitee 554; so have I blis 392; so moot I thee 210 (see note); I wol nat lye 179. Another kind is represented by grete and lyte 166. Some are adverbs: for the nones 567; on a day 347. Others are phrases like quod he 251, 277; as ye may heere 486 (cp. 497 f.); I can sey you namoore 203; my tale is at an ende 316. Notice also Chauntecleer the fuire 453; so free 503. All are useful in spoken verse, which cannot be so concentrated as verse intended for a reader.

66 Her cottage was of two rooms—the bower or bedroom and the hall or living-room, this last not an elegant room, for Chantecler and his hens roosted there at night (l. 118). It was sooty from the open fire, which perhaps had a central hearth and no chimney.

70 accordant to hir cote: 'in keeping with her cottage'.

73 hertes suffisaunce: 'contentment'.

74 The goute &c.: 'gout did not stop her dancing at all (nothyng)'; i. e. she was not troubled by gouty feet.

76 neither whit ne reed: for the effects of these, see Pardoner's Tale, C. 562 ff. :—

Now kepe yow fro the white and fro the rede,
And namely fro the whitte wyn of Lepe
That is to selle in Fysshstrete or in Chepe!
This wyn of Spaigne crepeth subtilly
In othere wynes growynge faste by,
Of which ther ryseth swich fumositee
That whan a man hath dronken draughtes thre,
And weneth that he be at hoom in Chepe,
He is in Spaigne right at the toune of Lepe!

79 f. 'broiled (or smoked?) bacon and sometimes an egg or two, for she was, so to speak, a kind of dairy-keeper.'

80 a maner deye: a common construction, cp. Monk's Tale 771 above: noon oother maner thyng. Old English had a phrase with the genitive plural of cynn 'kin', e. g. ealra cynna wildor 'wild beasts' of all kinds. With weakening of the inflexions in ME., this became alle cynne bestes, later al kyn bestes, and the true construction was no longer felt. When the French noun maner(e) was borrowed, it was properly construed with of: al maner of bestes; an manere of fishe; but it also took the construction of kyn: al maner bestes; a maner fish. Ultimately of survived in both phrases: all kinds of beasts; what manner of man?

83 ff. There is a great deal of mock-heroics in this description, e. g. in l. 97, and it is worth comparing the descriptions in Sir

Thopas. A late Middle English song runs (partly normalized):—

I have a gentil cok
Croweth me day;
He doth me rysen erly
My matynes for to say.

I have a gentil cok,
Comen he is of gret;¹
His comb is of reed coral,
His tayl is of jet.

¹ great stock.

I have a gentil cok,
Comen he is of kynde;²
His comb is of reed coral,
His tayl is of inde;³

² high lineage.

³ dark blue.

His legges ben of asour⁴
So gentil and so smale;
His spors arn of sylver whyt
Into the wortewale;⁵

⁴ azure.

⁵ root.

His eyen arn of cristal Locken al in amber;
And every nyght he percheth hym
In myn ladyes chamber.

(Brit. Mus. Sloane MS. 2593).

83 heet Chauntecleer: best taken as an ellipse of the relative (cp. the note to l. 133 f.), '⟨who⟩ was called Chantecler', where heet is the past tense of OE. hātan, used in the passive sense. The variant reading highte may either be construed in the same way (cp. that highte Malle above) or as a past participle 'named'. For the complicated history of this verb, see N. E. D.

84 of crowyng nas his peer: 'there was not his equal in crowing'. Middle English often dispenses with the temporary subject 'there' or 'it': e. g. were goodly 'it would be good' 13; nere clynkyng 'were it not for the clinking' 28; bifel, 116, 235, 425, 'it happened'; happed so, 221.

85 f. orgon . . . gon: the 3rd pl. gon (the 3rd sg. is goth) indicates that orgon is plural; and Latin organa is a neuter plural because the instrument is made up of many pipes. But as there is no parallel in English for orgon plural, it is perhaps better to assume a careless construction here, influenced by the necessities of rime: 'pleasanter ⟨to hear⟩ than the sweet-toned organ,—(those) that play in the church on feast-days'.

88 Note the scansion, any_abbey (three syllables), which is not uncommon in Chaucer; cp. note to l. 135.

89 ff. The equinoctial is the celestial equator, an imaginary circle through the heavens so drawn that the ecliptic (i. e. the circle representing the apparent annual course of the sun) cuts it at the equinoxes, 21 March and 23 September. Any point in the circumference of the equinoctial was supposed to be moving round it towards the west, completing the circle of 360° in 24 hours. Thus 15° of the equinoctial represents one hour. Now if we imagine a point in the equinoctial which ascends (i. e. rises above the horizon) at 6 a.m., then by 7 a.m. it will have travelled 15° along the equinoctial, and a second point in the equinoctial corresponding to 7 a.m. will be rising above the horizon. The Cock knew by nature the positions of each of these imaginary points, and so was able to crow every hour—according to sidereal time. But it was local sidereal time, depending on the longitude of the town in which the observer was; so Chaucer has a purpose when he specifies in thilke town. On the ability of cocks as astronomers Pliny in his Natural History, x. 21, says:—‘Norunt sidera, et ternas distinguunt horas interdiu cantu’, &c.

90 Scan: thēquynoxiāl (five syllables). Skeat follows some MSS. in omitting the, but the invariable use of the article with equinoxial in Chaucer’s Astrolabe seems decisive.

92 ‘So that it could not be bettered’, ‘perfectly’.

102 as of colours: ‘in colour’; here ‘as’ may be rendered ‘in respect of’, but comparison with 227 as for that nyght, 319 as for that day, 234 as in commune ‘commonly’, shows that it has practically no meaning. Cp. note to l. 673.

103 the faireste hewed on hir throte: ‘she who had the brightest feathers on her throat’. The mention of Pertelote’s throte is suggested by the difficulty of finding rimes for her name. In the only other rime throte is used again (ll. 119f.). We must picture her as an old-fashioned varicoloured barndoor-fowl, not one of the modern pure breeds.

104 damoysele: apparently disyllabic like modern damsel, and faïré takes the weak adjective inflexion, either because it is a quoted vocative (cp. 339), or because the weak adjective is preferred before proper names.

108 ff. ‘She has in her keeping the heart of Chantecler <whose> every limb <was> bound fast <by love>. He loved her so that his happiness was complete’ (lit. ‘happiness came (was) to him with it’). But this paraphrase of the first sentence is more logical than the original. See note to l. 113.

111 swich a joye was it: this is a natural enough form of exclamation in modern English, but where there is no correlative clause, Middle English uses which a joy! The earliest examples of such in this sense in N. E. D. are from the sixteenth century, so perhaps the construction is broken here.

III-135 The Nun's Priest's Tale

hem: the Cock is ordinarily the songster; but Pertelote and Chantecler are no mere Cock and Hen—they are a lady and her knight. Hence they sing an old English song 'in sweete accord'. Elsewhere Chantecler has a shirt (l. 354) and a beard (l. 154); and Pertelote's ideal husband is the same as any other woman's (l. 146 ff.). This trick of giving the animals human attributes is carried to great lengths in the later Reynard stories, where they ride horses, fight in armour, &c. Chaucer uses it more delicately to extract the maximum of fun from the story.

113 My lief is faren in londe: 'My love has gone away'. Skeat (Athenæum, 24 Oct. 1896, p. 566) found a verse of this song in Trinity College, Cambridge MS. R. 3. 19, and it must have been running in Chaucer's head when he wrote ll. 108-9:—

My lefe ys faren in lond; Allas! why ys she so?
 And I am so sore bound¹ ¹ ? read in bonde.
 I may nat com her to.
She hath my hert in hold Wherever she ryde or go,
 With trew love a thousandfold.

121 as man that: 'like one who'; cp. 512, 557. Here man is used as an indefinite pronoun, like OE. man 'one', but it is not a continuation of that use.

125 Ye been a verray slepere: 'A fine sleeper you are!'

127 f. 'I pray you don't be offended. I dreamt I was in such trouble just now that', &c.

128 By God! Like French mon Dieu, German mein Gott. Such oaths and asseverations were common form in Chaucer's time, despite the efforts of preachers (cp. Pardoner's Tale C. 629 ff.), and their frequency weakened their force. They were swept out of literary use by the Puritan reform. Cp. note to l. 64.

130 recche aright: 'interpret favourably', in the sense 'give a fortunate issue to'.

133 f. 'Where I saw a beast (that) was like a dog, and that would have seized me and killed me'. In early English the relative is often not expressed, but relation is indicated by juxtaposing the principal and relative clauses; so l. 409 'He hadde founde a corn lay in the yerd' = 'that lay'. Cp. note to l. 83.

135 han: I retain the reading of the more careful MSS. against wolde han of the independent Corpus group of MSS.; but the choice is difficult. If han is original, wolde may be miscopied from the line above. If wolde han is original, wolde may have been discarded by some early corrector as unnecessary to the sense and the metre. Yet Chaucer would probably scan body and as two syllables, not three. Cp. body is (two syllables) 253; many a (two syllables) 209, &c.; and note to l. 88.

139 his snowté smal: 'his muzzle slim'. Cp. l. 542 n.

140 his look: it is hard to decide whether this means 'the expression of his eyes', or the whole appearance of the beast—'the look of him'.

142 hertéles: 'coward', cp. l. 145.

144 myn . . . my: note that myn is used before a vowel or initial h; my before a consonant.

148 ff. So Hercules told Hypsipyle that Jason was 'wyse, hardy, secree and ryche' and excelling in 'fredome', Leg. Good Women 1528 ff.; and the merchant's wife in the Shipman's Tale B. 1363 ff. says all women require husbands to be 'Hardy and wise, and riche, and therto free'. Avauntours 'boasters', with reference to those who brag of their success in love; cp. Troilus ii. 724 ff.

151 f. By that God above! . . . love: note the repetition of l. 143 and the rime. To introduce above was almost the only way of riming love, for dove still had a long vowel in Chaucer's day, and though shove as a past participle would rime, its meaning lessened its usefulness.

156 vanitee: in its etymological sense 'emptiness'.

157 ff. On compleccioun, humour, repleccioun (which can also mean 'over-eating' as in l. 71) see note to l. 160 ff. Fume is noxious vapours, supposed to arise from the stomach and trouble the brain.

160 ff. Pertelote's diagnosis is minutely adapted to the symptoms. Diseases were supposed to arise from the excess (repleccioun) of one or more of the four 'humours' or bodily moistures: cholera or yellow-red bile in choleric persons, melancholia or black bile in the melancholic, blood in the sanguine, phlegm in the phlegmatic; and the particular blending of these humours in any one person determined his 'temperament' or 'complexion'—both meaning properly 'blending'. Further, the excess of a humour produced dreams in which the corresponding colour occurred—the choleric dreamt of fiery red things (163 ff.); the melancholic of black things (167 ff.); Chantecler has dreamt of a beast betwixe yellow and reed with black markings. It follows that he is suffering from excess of yellow-red and black bile, and that the treatment is physic to purge him of colere and maléncolye (l. 180).

161-174 The Nun's Priest's Tale

161 comth of the greté: the Ellesmere MS. has the uncontracted cometh, which often disturbs the rhythm in MSS. of Chaucer (e. g. in Pardoner's Tale C. 656; Parlement of Fowles, ll. 23, 25); and also the unmetrical and ungrammatical the greet, where the weak adjectival form greté must be restored. Such a line shows that even the best MSS. cannot be relied on to reproduce the details of Chaucer's own manuscript. They were copied in the fifteenth century, when the grammatical forms on which his metre depends had to some extent broken down.

163 f. dreden . . . of: the construction might seem to favour the variant reading dremen for dreden; but in Middle English dreden can take of governing the thing dreaded; cp. M.T. 738 above.

164-6 'Fire with red flames' and 'red beasts' are obvious dreams arising from the fiery 'cholera'. Conteks, 'quarrels', are scenes of violence, for Contek is personified 'with bloody knyf and sharpe manace' (Knight's Tale A. 2003). The commonest dogs (whelpes) may have been of the yellowish-red kind, but more likely a dogfight troubled the sleeper. It is not easy to see the appropriateness of arrows, unless fiery arrows are meant.

169 beres should be two syllables, so that the variant reading in the footnote is smoother.

170 Either (i) the relative is omitted: or else black devils (who) try to seize them' (cp. l. 165 and note to l. 133 f.); or (ii) the construction is broken = 'or else (they dream that) black devils', &c.

172 werken . . . ful wo: the phrase occurs elsewhere, e.g. Havelok 2453 (cp. ibid. 611). Wo is properly a noun, and is construed with a dative, e.g. him was wo. When the dative was a noun without inflexion, (John was wo), John was understood as the subject, and wo as an adjective 'woeful', with which the intensive adverb ful could be used—John was ful wo. In werken ful wo, it seems that ful has become attached to the noun wo, because it was often used with wo adj. Translate 'cause much distress'.

174 f. Catoun: Dionysius Cato, to whom the Disticha Catonis, a fourth-century collection of moral sayings in Latin verse, are attributed. It was in regular use as a school-book up to the seventeenth century, and was prescribed in the statutes of many old grammar schools. The saying referred to is in Book ii, distich 32:

Somnia ne cures, nam mens humana quod optat

Dum vigilat sperat, per sompnum cernit idipsum.

ne do no fors of dremes 'attach no importance to dreams' translates the italicized words. There is an Old English and several Middle English versions of the Distichs. See Wells, Manual, pp. 378, 822.

177 as taak: 'take'. This form of the imperative with as (sometimes so) is very common in Chaucer, but has yet to be recorded outside his works. It is a polite form in which as, so make the command less abrupt, and seems to be modelled on the subjunctive 'as (so) help me God', &c.

182 Though in this town is noon apothecarie: a precise detail, but the rimes to some extent steer the sense. So tarie: apothecarie rime in the Pardoner's Tale, C. 851 f.

183 techen: 'direct'.

186 'Which have naturally (by kynde) from their special virtue (propree) (the power) to purge you, upwards and downwards (bynethe and eek above)'.

189 coleryk of compleccioun: the description of the Cock, with his coral-red comb and feathers of burnished gold, is sufficient warrant for this; see note to l. 160 ff. Complexion now has the narrow sense 'colour & texture of the skin of the face', the face being regarded as the index of the 'complexion' or blending of humours in the body.

190 f. Waré, &c.: 'Beware lest the sun, as his altitude increases (during summer), should find you full of hot humours'. The humours were classified as hot and cold, dry and moist. Choler was hot and dry, Blood was hot and moist.

193 severe terciàne: a fever increasing in violence every other day, as distinct from a quotidian, in which the crises came every day, and a quartan in which it came every third day. On the old way of reckoning what we should call every second day was called every third (tertianus).

197-9 After the worms taken as a digestive (i.e. a medicine to promote digestion of food, here chosen with an eye to the habits of birds), the following herbs were used as laxatives:—

lawriol: the spurge laurel (Daphne laureola). A Boke of the Properties of Herbes (1550) says: 'it wyll make a man laxatyve and it is good to purge a man of flewme and of the coler.'

centaure: the lesser centaury (Erythraea centaurium) used to purge choler and phlegm.

fumetère: 'fumitory' (Fumaria officinalis). Another purge for melancholy: 'it openeth the lyver and it clereth a man's blode.'

ellëbor: there are two kinds, the black (Helleborus niger) 'called blacke . . . because it purgeth the coleryke blacke humours' according to The Great Herball of Treviris (1526); and the white (Veratrum album) which was particularly used against phlegm and 'purgeth upward by vomyte' ibid.

katapucé: According to the authority just quoted 'it is the frute or sede of a tree that is called catapucia, and whan catapucia is founde in receptes, it is meant the fruyte and not the herbe . . . It hath vertu to purge the flewmes principally, and secondly the melancholyke & coleryke humours. It hath might to purge above because it causeth wind that restrayneth the humoures upwarde.'

199-217 The Nun's Priest's Tale

gaitrys beryis: apparently berries of the buckthorn (Rhamnus catharticus), a strong purgative, formerly considered effective against choler. In modern dialects gaiter berries or gattridge berries are usually the berries of Dogwood (Cornus sanguinea), but its berries have no medicinal use, and are very like those of buckthorn. Neither kind can be gathered in May.

198 that groweth there: a forced rime, but there can be referred back to in oure yeerd in l. 185.

200 herbe-yve: perhaps the buck's horn, coronopus, OFr. herbe yve. Oddly enough, though the rhythm shows that yve is a monosyllable, the commentators have taken it as a kind of ivy, OE. īfig, which must be two syllables, and have been hard put to it to explain the medical use of ivy. Buck's horn has the medicinal properties of the plantains, which were given to cure jaundice and tertian fevers.

in oure yeerd ther mery is: another of Chaucer's forced rimes. He is often driven to this device of riming the plural ending with the verb is (cp. 155 f., 469 f.); and beryis is a troublesome word, for which rimes were almost impossible to find; ther = 'where': translate 'in that pleasant spot in our yard', or possibly 'in our pleasant yard'.

201 Note the scansion:

'Pékkehem ùp | ríght as | they grówe, | and éte | hem ýn'.

202 for youre fader kyn: 'for the sake of your father's stock'; where fader is a correct old form of the genitive sg. Often a mere tag; but Chantecler was proud of his race, and the Fox played on the same string (529 ff.).

210 so moot I thee!: 'so may I prosper!' OE. þēon 'to thrive'; cp. 666 and note to l. 50.

213 ff. On the significance of dreams, see Hous of Fame (at the beginning), Roman de la Rose (the beginning), and Troilus v. 358 ff. Curiosity about their interpretation gave rise to an important branch of popular literature—the 'dream-books', of which the mediæval examples trace back to Byzantine Greek sources. There are texts in Anglo-Saxon and in Middle English; but beyond the general statement that to dream of being attacked by a beast, or indeed to dream of any quadruped, meant trouble, they do not help much.

217 'The actual result (preevé) shows it, in practice'; if preevé means 'test of experience', the general sense is the same.

218 oon of the gretteste auctour: so the best MSS. In Middle English there is a fairly common construction 'one the greatest (man)' like Latin unus maximus. In late Middle English 'one of the greatest (men)', i. e. 'one from among the greatest', tends to replace it. Here we seem to have a transitional stage, with of from the new construction and the singular auctour from the old. Cp. Melibeus (B. 2868) 'ye knowen wel that oon of the gretteste and moost sovereyn thyng that is in this world'. The author referred to is either Cicero, who in De Divinatione i, c. 27, tells both stories in reverse order, or Valerius Maximus who has the second story at i, c. 8 (3) and the first at i, c. 8 (10) of his Facta et Dicta Memorabilia. Valerius borrows from Cicero, and it is hard to say which author Chaucer's free versions derive from, for where he seems nearer to Valerius, the chances of coincidence in variation from Cicero are great. Here are the two versions:—

Cicero i. 27.

(i) Unum de Simonide: qui cum ignotum quendam proiectum mortuum vidisset eumque humauisset, haberetque in animo nauem conscendere, moneri visus est ne id faceret ab eo quem sepultura adfecerat; si nauigauisset, eum naufragio esse peritum; itaque Simonidem rediisse, periisse ceteros qui tum nauigauissent.

(ii) Alterum ita traditum, clarum admodum somnium: cum duo quidam Arcades familiares iter una facerent et Megaram venissent, alterum ad coponeir deuertisse, ad hospitem alterum; qui ut cenati quiescerent concubia nocte visum esse in somnis ei qui erat in hospitio, illum alterum orare ut subueniret, quod sibi a copone interitus Valerius Maximus i. c. 8 (3).

(i) Longe indulgentius dii in poeta Simonide cuius salutarem inter quietem admonitionem consilii firmitate roborarunt. Is enim cum ad litus nauem appulisset inhumatumque corpus iacens sepulturae mandasset, admonitus ab eo ne proximo die nauigare, in terra remansit. Qui inde soluerant, fluctibus et procellis in conspectu eius obruti sunt; ipse laetatus est quod vitam suam somnio quam naui credere maluisset. Memor autem beneficii elegantissimo carmine aeternitati consecrauit, melius illi et diuturnius in animis hominum sepulcrum constituens quam in desertis et ignotis harenis struxerat.

ibid., c. 8 (10).

(ii) Proximum somnium etsi paulo est longius, propter nimiam tamen euidetiam ne omittatur impetrat. Duo familiares Arcades iter una facientes Megaram uenerunt, quorum alter se ad hospitem contulit, alter in tabernam meritoriam deuertit. Is qui in hospitio erat pararetur: eum primo perterritum somnio surrexisse, dein cum se conlegisset idque visum pro nihilo habendum esse duxisset, recubuisse; tum ei dormienti eundem illum visum esse rogare ut, quoniam sibi viuo non subuenisset, mortem suam ne inultam esse pateretur: se interfectum in plaustrum a copone esse coniectum et supra stercus iniectum; petere ut mane ad portam adesset, priusquam plaustrum ex oppido exiret. Hoc vero eum somnio commotum mane bulco praesto ad portam fuisse, quaesisse ex eo quid esset in plastro: illum perterritum fugisse, mortuum erutum esse, coponem repatefacta poenas dedisse.

vidit in somniis comitem suum orantem ut sibi coponis insidiis circumuento subueniret: posse enim celeri eius adcurso se imminenti periculo subtrahi. Quo visu excitatus prosiluit tabernamque, in qua is deuersabatur, petere conatus est. Pestifero deinde fato eius humanissimum propositum tamquam superuacuum damnauit et lectum ac somnum repetit. Tunc idem ei saucius oblatus obsecrauit ut, quoniam vitae suae auxilium ferre neglexisset, neci saltem ultionem non negaret: corpus enim suum a copone trucidatum tum maxime plastro ferri ad portam stercore coopertum. Tam constantibus familiaris precibus compulsus protinus ad portam cucurrit et plaustrum, quod in quiete demonstratum erat, comprehendit coponemque ad capitale supplicium perduxit.

Probably Chaucer had the stories neither from Cicero nor Valerius, but from some medieval collection in which the classical source was quoted. Miss Petersen On the Sources, &c. has suggested use of Libri Sapientiae, by Robert Holkot (d. 1349) which contains both stories (they are not connected) with a reference to Valerius, as well as a good deal of matter on dreams, &c. that has close parallels in Chaucer. But the range of material in the Middle Ages was narrow, the topic was popular, and the chance of coincidence great. It is possible, but not likely, that Chaucer drew upon Holkot.

219-34 All this is expanded to suit medieval conditions from the simple statement in Cicero and Valerius that two men on their way to Megara spent the night, one with a friend, the other at an inn.

221-3 'a town where so many people were gathered, and (which) was so short of accommodation that', &c.

231 fer in a yeerd: 'far down a yard'; the point is that he was far away from the house and the street, and therefore far from help.

250 morwe-tyde: 'morning', cp. 464, 488. That tomorwe 315 is 'to-morrow morning', not simply 'to-morrow' in the modern sense, appears from l. 309.

251 the westgate: the medieval town was regularly walled against enemies, and the gates were often called after the quarter in which they were placed. So the writer of the Ayenbyte is called Dan Michel of Northgate; and Eastgate, Westgate, Southgate are still common personal names.

254 do thiikē carte arresten: 'cause (somebody) to arrest it', 'have it stopped'—a regular ME. use of do + infinitive.

258 trustē: for the imperative plural Chaucer uses indifferently the normal form in -eth, e.g. herkneth 636, turneth 643; or a shorter form in -e, as here. A good example of the alternatives is Clerk's Tale, ll. 7-20.

260 in: 'inn'.

263 answērede: MS. answerde, but it is better not to assume that e before hym is syllabic. Cp. the quotation in the note to l. 673 ff., where the MS. again has answerde; and note to l. 318 f.

266 gan fallen in suspecioun: 'became suspicious'; cp. l. 307 n. Note the variant reading.

270 as it were: oddly used, perhaps to indicate the ostensible purpose, the real purpose being to hide the body. But the suspicious construction, and the occurrence of wente in so many good MSS. (see footnote), cannot be neglected: the reading is possibly right.

A dōng-|carte wēnte | as it wére | to dōng|ē lōnd

273 with an hardy herte: = boldely, 254.

276 gapyng upright: 'face upwards (upright) with mouth open' i.e. with the jaw dropped in death. Note the scansion

And ín | this cárte | héere he lith | gápyng | upríght |
as if to suggest hurried and excited speech.

280 What sholde I . . . ?: 'Why should I . . . ?'

284 ff. Opposite these lines the Ellesmere MS. has Auctor, indicating that they are to be read as a comment by Chaucer.

286 Mordre wol out: an instance of the ellipse of a verb of motion after will, which was still common in Shakespeare's time, e.g. 'I will myself into the pulpit first', Julius Caesar, III. i. 236. The proverb occurs again in the Prioress's Tale B. 1766.

287 abhomynable: the spelling with h is due to a false etymology, ab homine, as if 'alien to man's nature'. The true derivation is Latin ab-ominari, 'to turn away from as of ill-omen'.

291 this my conclusioun: common in Middle English for the fuller expression this is; so Parlement of Fowles 620, this my conclusion. The copyists sometimes inserted is where the rhythm shows that it should be omitted, e.g. Franklin's Tale F. 889

As kepe | my lord ! | this is my | conclu|sioun ;

291-312 The Nun's Priest's Tale

Clerk's Tale 56

But this | is his tal^le which | that ye | may heere.

293 f. pyned . . . engyned: 'tortured . . . racked'—methods of securing a confession which were long considered a necessary part of judicial procedure.

297 to drede: 'to be dreaded', the Old English gerundial infinitive to drædanne. Chaucer uses for to drede in the same sense when it is metrically convenient, e.g. l. 343. Cp. note to Monk's Tale 745 f.

299 right in the nexte chapitre after this: in Cicero Chaucer's second story precedes the first; in Valerius Maximus it is several sections earlier (cp. note to l. 218). Either Chaucer is writing from memory, or he took the stories from some intermediary in which they were rearranged. Holkot has them in the same order as Chaucer, but they are not close together.

301 Two men that: Chaucer gets lost in the succession of subordinate clauses beginning with that, and there is no formal predicate to two men.

307 gan chaunge and blew: 'changed and blew'—a good example of gan + infinitive used to express the simple preterite; cp. ll. 112, 237, 266, 408, 516. Bigan is sometimes used in the same way with no inchoative sense, e.g. Monk's Tale 760. It is often difficult to decide whether the best rendering is the preterite, e.g. ll. 120, 262, 273, 321.

309 casten hem: 'made up their minds', 'resolved'—an earlier example of this reflexive use of cast than those in N.E.D.

310 (herkneth): the verse is complete without this word; but such extra-metrical asides are too common in Middle English to be rejected off-hand: cp. Sir Orfeo 419

'O lord,' (he seyde), 'ȝif it thi wille were'.

There is an instance in Chaucer's Legend of Good Women 1338

(And seyde) 'O swete cloth, while Juppiter hit leste',

which Skeat emends by omitting swete, and the Globe edition by altering Juppiter to Jove. The licence belongs to the tradition of spoken verse, where the minstrel could by his tone distinguish the intrusive words from the verse proper.

311 f. that oon . . . hym mette: mette 'dreamt' is either personal or impersonal (note to Monk's Tale 750 above), and here it seems to be both. Probably this is a loose construction; but that oon . . . hym may be taken together as a dative equivalent.

312 agayn the day: 'just before dawn'. Dreams after midnight were regarded as more significant than dreams early in the night. Cp. ll. 116, 235.

318 f. preyede . . . preyede: MS. preyde . . . preyde, and the editors make up the metre by assuming that the final -e of preyde is syllabic, though it should normally be elided before hym as in Man of Law's Tale 1084

She preyd|e_hym eek | he wold|è by | no weye, or B. 1718 This preyd|e_hym | to cón|strue and | declare.
But the same form preyde disturbs the normal scansion over and over again, e.g. Miller's Tale A. 3838

- And that | he prey|de hem | for god|des love ;
E. 680 Save this | she prey|de hym | that if | he mighte ;
D. 959 He prey|de hire | that to | no cre|ature ;
C. 853 And prey|de hym | that he | hym wold|è selle ;
E. 1631 And prey|de hem | to la|boure in | this nede ;
F. 311 And prey|de hym | to tell|e_his go|vernaunce.

In D. 895 So long|è prey|den | the King | of grace, it is impossible to get round the difficulty by assuming syllabic -e in hiatus, so the editors read preyeden, and this is the solution of all such passages. Chaucer used two forms, preyede and preyde, but the scribes have usually altered preyede to preyde, spoiling the metre; cp. note to l. 263. This choice of forms was one of the great advantages of Middle English for easy narrative: Chaucer can use slave 248 or slayn 256 as past participles of slee(n), toos 565 or toon 96 as plurals of too, as it suits his rime; 'ther as he lay' 236 or 'ther I lye 239; for to drede 343 or to drede 297 n.; the pp. writen 675 or y-write 676; the infinitive in -en (gronen in 120) or in -e (grone in 124), according as it suits his rhythm.

320 that lay by his beddes syde: i.e. they shared a room; but Chaucer says so because it is convenient to repeat the rime of 313 f.

321 scorned him ful faste: 'poured scorn upon him'.

323 'that I will delay doing my business'. This verb let < OE. lettan is distinct from let 'allow, &c.' < OE. lētan. Its intransitive sense seems to arise from a reflexive use, 'hinder myself'.

326. alday: 'every day', 'always', 'constantly'. Owls were birds of ill-omen, but apes are probably mentioned for no better reason than the favourite rime with japes.

328 of thyng that nevere was, ne shal: supply 'be'; the ellipse is common after shal, e.g. Knight's Tale A. 1359 f.

So muchè sorwe hadde nevere creatùre

That is or shal.

Thing can be used in Middle English in an indefinite sense either with or without the indefinite article. In modern English we must say 'a thing' or 'things'.

331-357 The Nun's Priest's Tale

331 and have good day: 'so farewell'—a form of leave-taking.

335 casuelly: 'by some mischance'.

338 tyde: 'time', not 'tide' here.

344 ff. King Cēnwulf (Kenulphus) of Mercia (Mercenrike) died in the year 819. He is said to have been succeeded by his son Kenelm (OE. Cēnhelm), then only seven years old (cp. l. 351), who was murdered in Clent forest at the instigation of his sister Cwenthryth. Nothing is heard of St. Kenelm in documents earlier than the late tenth century, when his cult seems to have become active. His vision of a beautiful tree, which he climbed, only to find it cut away beneath him by his attendants, is not reported in the earlier authorities (such as Florence of Worcester, d. 1118), and is no doubt an invention, like the story of the psalter, long preserved at Winchcomb, which bore the marks where the eyes of his wicked sister Cwenthryth fell out as she read Psalm 108 to curse his funeral; or the story of the dove that flew to Rome and laid on the altar a slip of parchment with the words

On Clent Cubach Kenelme, kinges bern, Lith under thorn, hevede bireved.

The legend may be read in the South English Legendary (Early English Text Soc.), p. 345 ff.

345 the noble kyng, &c.; in apposition to Kenulphus, not to Kenelm.

350 f. to kepe hym weel For traisoun: 'to guard himself well against treason'—a fairly common ME. use of for.

352 litel talē hath he toold of: 'he attached little importance to'.

354 I haddē levere than my sherte: cp. note to l. 111. In Old English the expression was mē is lēofre 'it is dearer to me'; but in ME. a new form arises: I haddē levere 'I would hold it dearer'; and later the phrase I haddē rather was modelled upon it.

355 legende: in its strict sense, Latin legenda 'thing(s) to be read', modern 'lesson' in church. On a saint's day, his story, (or extracts from it) was read as part of the church service.

357 Macrobeus, that writ the Avisioun, etc.: Cicero's Somnium Scipionis (or Vision of Scipio Africanus Minor, d. B. C. 128), part of the sixth book of his de Republica, is known by the quotations embedded in the commentary of Macrobius Theodosius (circa 400 A. D.). Scipio relates a vision in which his grandfather, Scipio Africanus Major, appeared to him and, leading him to the Milky Way, showed him that he would conquer Carthage. Macrobius begins the commentary with a classification of dreams and their degrees of significance, and it was this, with the philosophic and astronomical explanations, that attracted medieval readers. It had some influence in making the dream a favourite setting for medieval works, e.g. Dante's Divina Commedia, the Roman de la Rose; and in English Pearl, the Vision of Piers Plowman; Chaucer's Dethe of Blaunche, Parlement of Fowles, Hous of Fame. In each of the three last poems Macrobius is referred to, and in Parlement of Fowles 29 ff., where Scipio is Chaucer's guide, there is a fairly full account of the Somnium Scipionis. Another very important passage for comparison is the beginning of the Roman de la Rose (translated by Chaucer), which probably suggested the reference.

358. In Affrike: Scipio was on a visit to the African prince Massinissa when he saw the vision: cp. Parlement of Fowles 36 f.

First telleth it, whan Scipioun was come

In Affrik, how he metté Massynisse . . .

362 of Daniel: 'concerning Daniel', like Latin de. See Daniel i. 17 and the following chapters.

364 Joseph: See Genesis xl, xli.

365 Wher: a short form of whether, cp. l. 369. It may introduce either an indirect or a direct question, and in the latter case it cannot be translated by whether. In l. 369 the question is perhaps direct: 'did they feel no consequences of dreams?'

370 seken actes: 'search the histories'—Latin acta 'things done'.

372 Lo Cresus: Observe how lo is used as an equivalent of looke, though they are of different origin: OE. lā 'lo!'; OE. lōca (imperative of lōcian) 'look'. The reference to Croesus, without any mention of the Monk's Tale, is an indication that the Nun's Priest's Tale was not originally written to follow the Monk's Tale in a larger work. See Introd. § iv, end, and note to Monk's Tale 737.

375 Andromacha: This dream is not in Homer. The medieval Troy story is a romance derived from the spurious Latin histories of Dares the Phrygian (fourth century A.D.) and Dictys of Crete. Life was infused into their narrative by Benoît de St. More in his French Roman de Troie (about 1184); and in 1287 Guido de Columnis abridged Benoît's poem to make the Latin prose Historia Troiana, from which derive the Middle English alliterative Destruction of Troy, Lydgate's Troy Book and the Laud Troy Book. The most famous story of the Troy cycle, Troilus and Cressida, came to Chaucer from Guido through Boccaccio. The dream of Andromache is in Dares c. xxiv; in Guido bk. xxi; in the alliterative Destruction of Troy ll. 8425 ff., &c.

376 sholdé lese: 'was destined to lose'.

384 I may nat dwelle: Chantecler must not neglect his duty of crowing at daybreak. See note to 546 f.

389 venymes: it is hard to decide between the plural noun and the adjective venymus which is found in some MSS.

395-413 The Nun's Priest's Tale

395 so scarlet-reed aboute youre eyen: Pertelote, as the ideal hen, was no doubt a great layer (cp. Pintre's reputation Introd. § ii), and the pinkish skin on a hen's head goes bright scarlet when she is laying.

397 Al so siker as In principio: 'as true as the gospel'. In principio (erat Verbum), 'In the beginning (was the Word)', is the opening of the Gospel of St. John, and the short name for its first fourteen verses, which were the most popular gospel-excerpt of the later Middle Ages, and were supposed to have extraordinary powers. The Friars, quick to catch the taste of the people, recited them from house to house (see Prologue 254—So plesaunt was his In principio). Hence Chantecler refers to them as gospel-truth par excellence, and declares that the following sentence is as true.

398 Mulier est hominis confusio: i.e. 'Woman is man's confusion'. A favourite form of medieval literature was the series of questions and answers, some instructive and some in the nature of riddles. Such are the dialogues of Solomon and Marcolf; Solomon and Saturn (in Anglo-Saxon); the Emperor Hadrian and Ritheus; Hadrian and Epictetus, &c. This particular answer is found in the dialogue attributed to Hadrian and the philosopher Secundus, which is reported by Vincent of Beauvais (see note to Monk's Tale 737 above) in his Speculum Historiale x. 70-1; and it is often found separate (see Modern Language Notes xxxv, p. 479 ff.):—Hadrian asks: 'Quid est mulier?' and Secundus answers: 'Hominis confusio, insaturabilis bestia, continua sollicitudo, indesinens pugna, viri continentis naufragium, humanum mancipium'. Chantecler quotes the first description, and takes advantage of Pertelote's lack of Latin to give it an opposite meaning. The Bible (Ecclus. xxv, xxvi) gives the model for the balancing of woman's qualities.

406 fly: 'flew' past tense; the forms fleigh (573, 651), fley, fly are all possible in the fourteenth century, representing one development of the OE. pa. t. sg. flēah; another development from the same form is flaugh 465; and the plural flowen 625 takes its vowel from the pa. t. pl. OE. flugon.

410 real and roial (the reading of the Ellesmere MS. in l. 418) have the same sense and the same etymology—Latin regalem; but real is the early French form, and roial is a later borrowing from Parisian French.

413 as it were a grym leoun: 'like a fierce lion'; in fact, the ancients believed that a cock, by his superb bearing, could overawe a lion. Pliny, Natural History, x. 21:—'(superbe) graditur, ardua cervice, cristis celsa; . . . caelumque sola volucrum aspicit crebro; in sublime caudam quoque falcata erigens; itaque terrori sunt etiam leonibus'.

421-4 An elaborate way of saying 'on May 3rd', on which date, for some obscure reason, Palamon breaks his prison (Knight's Tale A. 1462 f.), and Pandarus persuades Criseyde to hear Troilus's suit (Troilus ii, 56). But how is the date deduced from the clumsy expression? Omit syn Marche bigan and all is clear, for March = 31 days; 32 days were also passed; and 63 days bring us to May 3rd. The insertion of syn Marche bigan is easiest explained by a paraphrase:—'When (i) the 31 days of March were passed (compleet), and (ii) 32 days in addition to them (= also) were passed: then adding (i) and (ii) together, and reckoning from the first of March, we get May 3rd.

421 the monthe in which the world bigan: from the story of Genesis authoritative writers such as St. Ambrose and Bede assumed that the creation took place about the vernal equinox (March 21st), and Bede, placing three of the six days of Creation before that date, makes March 18th the first day of the world.

428 f. The Zodiac is an imaginary circular band round the heavens, and the sun's annual course is the middle of this band. The band was divided among 12 signs of the Zodiac, the first Aries 'the Ram', the second Taurus 'the Bull', &c., and each of these signs was allotted a twelfth of the circular band, i.e. 30 degrees. As the number of degrees in a circle and the number of days in the year are approximately the same, 1 day is approximately 1 degree of the sun's course round the Zodiac, and 1 month (30 days) is approximately the time the sun would spend in each sign of the Zodiac. The sun was reckoned to begin in the first sign, Aries, on March 12th, which was then, owing to a miscalculation, supposed to be the vernal equinox. Then 11 days of March, plus 30 days for the 30 degrees of Aries, plus 21 days for the 21 degrees of Taurus traversed, bring us to May 2nd. One day more is accounted for by Chaucer's somwhat moore, and an allowance for the error in reckoning 1 degree as 1 day.

433 fourty degrees and oon and moore: In l. 428 f. the reckoning applied to the annual course of the sun through the signs of the Zodiac, which gives the month and the day. Here the daily course of the sun from horizon to horizon is referred to, in order to give the hour of the day. It happens that on May 3rd the sun would have risen just a little over 41 degrees by 9 a.m. (i.e. pryme).

438 'a sad mischance befell him'.

439 Cp. the Vulgate, Proverbs xiv. 13 'extrema gaudii luctus occupat'. So Troilus iv. 834 ff.

Endeth than love in wo? Ye, or men lieth;
And every worldly joye, as thinketh me:
The ende of blisse ay sorwe it occupieth!

439-461 The Nun's Priest's Tale

and Man of Law's Tale 421 ff.

O sodeyn wo, that ever art súccessour
To worldly blisse . . .

Wo occupieth the fyn of oure gladnesse.

441-3 These lines seem to be rather pointless elaboration. Perhaps they are meant as humorous support to the truth of the story, like ll. 445-7; the argument being:—that woe follows bliss is certain enough to be recorded in a chronicle history; therefore the Cock's mishap, which is an instance of this, is as true as a chronicle.

446 the book of Launcelot de Lake: the story of Lancelot, the perfect knight and lover of Arthur's queen, Guinevere. Chaucer refers to the French prose Lancelot, or some derivative from it. The early Scottish Lancelot du Laik, which has no poetical merit, is about a century later than Chaucer; and the first considerable English version of the Lancelot story is Malory's Morte d'Arthur in 1470.

447 That wommen holde: ambiguous. Who was not yet in use as a relative, so that was used both of persons and things. Here that probably refers to Lancelot, the ideal knight, rather than to the book of Lancelot. Cp. Squire's Tale 287.

448 torne: Ellesmere MS. come; a good instance of a copyist's error, for in hands of the time t and c are hard to distinguish, and rn is easily misread as m. Cp. note to 596.

450 yeres three: presumably because it rimes with iniquitee.

451 By heigh ymaginacioun forncast: 'foreseen by the exalted imagination'—referring to Chantecler's dream. Others take it as 'pre-destined by God'.

452 the samè nyght: i. e. in the early hours of the same morning, which were reckoned as part of the night. hegges: here apparently in the general sense 'fences', cp. l. 82.

455 wortes: probably 'cabbages' as in the Roman de Renart, Introd. § ii.

456 undren: strictly 9 a.m., but often used loosely, as here, to cover the whole forenoon.

457 waitynge his tyme: 'watching his opportunity'. Note how easily the original sense of wait (which is a borrowing from Northern French, equivalent to Parisian and modern French guetter) merges into the modern sense; and how a new transitive sense of watch (< OE. wæccan intrans., derived from the same stem wak- that is the base of wait) develops in the late Middle English and takes the place of wait 'to watch'.

461 Scariot: Judas Iscariot; for the loss of the initial unaccented vowel cp. Spain < French Espagne < Latin Hispania. Genyloun:

Ganelon in the Roman de Roland, who betrayed the rear-guard of Charlemagne's army at Roncesvalles. He is the typical traitor of the Charlemagne romances, as Judas is in the Bible, and Sinon in the Troy Romance. It was Sinon who had charge of the horse full of men which was treacherously introduced into Troy, and in the classical version of the story he persuaded Priam to receive it into the city as an offering to Pallas; Aeneid ii. 57 ff.

470 Witnesse on hym that any parfit clerk is: 'take any finished scholar as witness (that); i. e. 'any good scholar will tell you (that)'.

471 in scole: in the schools of philosophy at the Universities.

473 and hath been of, &c.: 'and (in the past) there has been discussion by countless men'.

474 bulle it to the bren: a metaphor from the sifting or boulting of flour to separate it from the less valuable bran.

475 Agustyn: St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo in Africa (354-430), not the apostle of the Anglo-Saxons. In Augustine's time the Welsh scholar Pelagius began the 'Pelagian' heresy, claiming that man is not necessarily sinful, but has the power, of his own will, to choose between good and evil. To this St. Augustine opposed the doctrine of grace: man is sinful since Adam's fall, and only by the grace of God can he do anything good. This leads to the doctrine that God foreknows and foreordains all things; and the various attempts to leave some room for human choice are so intricate and so debatable that Chaucer very wisely refuses to meddle with them. The Late Latin form Agust- for August- is found as early as the first century A. D.

476 Boece: Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius (d. 524) attained consular rank, and was the trusted adviser of the Emperor Theodoric; but in the end he was put to death by his cruel master. In his last imprisonment he wrote in prose and verse one of the great books of the Middle Ages, the de Consolatione Philosophiae, which kept alive the tradition of Aristotle and Plato. King Alfred translated it, so did Chaucer, and Queen Elizabeth after him. It seems to have been Chaucer's favourite book. See notes to 477 ff. and 528.

the Bisshop Bradwardyn: Thomas Bradwardine (d. 1349) distinguished himself by his lectures at Merton College, Oxford, which were put together in a huge book, de Causa Dei contra Pelagium. He adopts and develops the position taken up by St. Augustine: that man can only resist temptation by divine grace, which he can never deserve; and that God's foreknowledge is absolute. He was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury in 1349, and died in the Great Plague of that year.

477-505 The Nun's Priest's Tale

477-84 Chaucer states three positions:

- (i) ll. 477-9 God foreknows and foreordains all things.
- (ii) ll. 480-2 God foreknows, but free choice to do or not to do is left to man.
- (iii) ll. 483-4 God foreknows, but his foreknowledge involves not 'simple necessity', but only 'conditional necessity', to do a thing.

He is thinking of the passage at the end of Boethius de Consolatione Philosophiae. Philosophy maintains that God foreknows all things and yet that there is room for free-will. Boethius raises the obvious objection—that the one precludes the other. Philosophy replies that the difficulty is due to human failure to conceive of the simplicity of God's nature, and ends a long argument by distinguishing two kinds of necessity: simple necessity, e.g. that men should die or the sun rise; and conditional necessity, that a man should take a walk. In the second she claims that there is an element of free-will; and though God knows that the man will walk, His foreknowledge does not make it necessary that the man should walk. This long and subtle argument, which hardly stills doubt, should be read in Chaucer's translation.

487 with sorwe: 'with disastrous results'.

490 Wommennes conseils, &c.: a proverb of Norse origin: ON. köld eru oft kvænna ráð, lit. 'cold are often women's counsels', where cold means 'baneful'. It occurs in the Proverbs of Alfred (thirteenth century): cold red is quene red. For a defence of women's counsel, see Tale of Melibeus § 15.

493 ther as: 'where'; cp. note to Monk's Tale 753 above.

494-500 Such apologies are very characteristic of Chaucer, and he usually makes the excuses that he is merely the reporter of somebody else's words and that it is all in fun; cp. Prologue 724 ff. Their model is Roman de la Rose 15159 ff., and particularly the apology to women, 15195 ff., which is followed here.

500 divyne: the verb 'divine', 'suppose', which is construed either with of or on; see the footnote.

503 agayn the sonne: 'in the sun'—'opposite to the sun' in the sense that she lay full in its rays.

505 Physiologus: A book (or the supposed author of a book) of beasts, birds and precious stones, with marvellous accounts of their nature and properties, and a religious interpretation. It seems to have arisen as a Greek book of instruction in Alexandria, perhaps as early as the second century; and it was soon translated into Latin and the chief languages of the Near East. From the Latin version came the medieval Bestiaries, of which there are Anglo-

Saxon fragments, a full Anglo-Norman version by Philippe de Thaon, and a Middle English version (ed. R. Morris, An Old English Miscellany, Early English Text Society). The section on the Fox is a fair sample; it is his habit to cover himself with red earth, sham death and hang out his tongue: when birds come to eat his tongue he catches them. He signifies the Devil, &c. The Siren sings in rough weather to attract ships, and her sweet voice makes the mariners forget their danger. The Siren signifies Riches; the Sea the World, &c. In these works the statements are regularly introduced by 'Physiologus says'. Of course Chaucer is laughing at the authority he adduces.

507 f. This picture of Chantecler—his eye led to the cabbages that hide the Fox by the flutterings of an attractive butterfly—rivals any of the touches of nature in the Roman de Renart.

510 Nothyng ne liste hym: 'he desired not at all'. Cp. note to l. 12.

518 wher wol ye gon?: wher is perhaps 'where', perhaps the short form of whether used to introduce a direct question: 'Are you going away?' Cp. note to l. 365.

521 wolde: 'purposed'.

522 youre conseil for t'espye: 'to spy out your secrets'.

528 Boece: Boethius (cp. note to l. 476). He passed down to the Middle Ages not only the philosophy of the classics, but also much of their science in three treatises: Institutio Arithmetica, based on the Greek writer Nicomachus of Gerasa; Institutio Musica, based on Nicomachus, Ptolemy, Euclid and other Greek sources; and Geometria, a lost work based on Euclid. The second treatise, written in five books, is referred to here.

530 of hire gentillesse: 'their' not 'her'.

531 to my greet ese: a veiled allusion to their fate.

533 But for men speke of syngyng: 'but since singing has been mentioned', cp. note to l. 624. A polite and not too pointed return to the subject he himself has started.

534 'So may I have good use of my two eyes!'—a common asseveration in Middle English: brouke < OE. brūcan 'to enjoy'; cp. note to l. 50. But here there is irony in the tag, for the Fox is going on to persuade Chantecler not to use his eyes.

542 smal: 'slender', cp. l. 139 n.

546 daun Burnel the Ass: another name for the Speculum Stultorum or 'Mirror of Fools', a Latin satirical poem written towards the end of the twelfth century by Nigel Wireker, a monk of Christ Church, Canterbury. The Ass, who typifies the monastic order, is its hero, and his name Burnel is a variant of Brunel (the 'little brown' animal) which is still used in France as a name for a donkey. The Ass wants to have a longer tail. His physician Galen tells him that he is as well furnished in this respect as King Louis of France, but gives him a prescription and advises him to go to the famous medical school of Salerno for the drugs. On his way back from Salerno a dog bites off half Burnel's tail, and he loses his medicines; so he decides to go to the University of Paris to become a scholar. On his way to Paris he falls in with a traveller called Arnold, who tells him this story:—Gundulf, the priest's son, when chasing a hen out of the barn, gave one of her chickens a knock with a stick and broke its leg. The time came when the bishop was to ordain Gundulf at a neighbouring town, so that he might succeed his father in the benefice; but on that morning the injured chicken, which had been nursing its vengeance for five years, refused to crow punctually and waken the candidate. Gundulf, arriving too late, missed the bishop and his ordination, and was ruined for life. The poem is edited by T. Wright in Anglo-Latin Satirical Poets and Epigrammatists of the Twelfth Century (Rolls Series, 1872, vol. i), see p. 54.

546-563 The Nun's Priest's Tale

549 Whil he was yong and nyce: i. e. while the priest's son was young and foolish (nyce).

551-3 The meaning seems to be 'Certainly there is no comparison between your father's wisdom and judgement and that cock's ingenuity'; 'of his subtiltee' is used illogically, as if the old construction comparisoun of had preceded, instead of comparisoun bitwixe.

555 Lat se: 'show me'; lit. 'let (one) see', with ellipse of the indefinite pronoun in the objective.

559-64 Allas, ye lordes:—Such an aside may be explained either as Chaucer's comment, or as a mere rhetorical address by the story-teller, made though there were no lords among the pilgrims to profit by it. Either view is possible here. But as the latter explanation is unsatisfactory for the words to 'chanouns religious' in the Canon's Yeoman's Tale l. 992 ff., or to 'ye maistresses that lordes doghtres han in governaunce' in the Doctor's Tale ll. 72 ff., there is no reason to accept it here in order to favour the 'dramatic' view of Chaucer's work. Cp. § iv, at the end.

560 Cp. Legend of Good Women Prol. 352:—

For in youre courte ys many a losengeour.

Both are imitated from Roman de la Rose 1034: 'A sa court ot maint losengier'.

563 Ecclesiaste: usually refers to Solomon as the author of Ecclesiastes, where there is no appropriate passage. But in the Wife of Bath's Prologue Ecclesiaste is applied to Ecclesiasticus, and it may have the same meaning here: Mr. Pollard compares the Vulgate, Ecclus. xxvii. 26 'In conspectu oculorum tuorum condulcabit os suum et super sermones tuos admirabitur' etc. But it may stand for Solomon in any of his works, and refer to Proverbs xxix. 5, which is quoted in Chaucer's Tale of Melibeus in the section on flattery (B. 2368):—'Salomon seith that "the wordes of a flaterere is a snare to cacche with innocentz"'. The advice of the flatterer Placebo in the Merchant's Tale, as contrasted with that of the truthful Justinus, illustrates Chaucer's point.

565-7 Chantecler carries out punctually the Fox's suggestions in ll. 539-42, which are very well thought out.

568 daun Russell: see Introduction, § iii, p. xxiii.

569 ff. Cp. with what follows The False Fox, a poem of the fifteenth century:—

The fals fox came unto oure croft
And so oure gese ful fast he sought :
With how, fox, how ! with hey, fox, hey !
Come no more unto oure house to bere our gese awaye ! . . .

The fals fox came into oure yerde,
And there he made the gese aferde ; &c. . . .

He toke a gose fast by the nek
And the goose thoo began to quek ; &c.

The good wyfe came out in her smok
And at the fox she threw hir rok ; &c.

The good man came out with his flayle
And smote the fox upon the tayle ; &c.

He threw a gose upon his bak
And furth he went thoo with his pak ; &c.

The good man swore, yf that he myght,
He wolde hym slee or it were nyght ; &c.

The fals fox went into his denne
And there he was full mery thenne ; &c. . . .

The good man saide unto his wyfe
'This fals fox lyveth a mery lyfe !'

With how, fox, how, &c.

(Reliquiae Antiquae i. p. 4.)

570 Cp. l. 13 of the poem just quoted ; and ll. 613, 639, below.

572-591 The Nun's Priest's Tale

572 O Destinee! From here to l. 607 the mock heroics are rather overdone.

581 O Gaufred: about the end of the twelfth century Geoffrey de Vinsauf, an Englishman who spent a good deal of time at Rome, wrote his Nova Poetria, a manual for poets containing precepts, with some examples of Geoffrey's own composition. Hence Chaucer calls him ironically deere maister souverayn. Among the examples is a lament for the death of Richard I, who received his mortal wound from an arrow on Friday, March 26, 1199, though he lingered on till April 6. It runs:

O Veneris lacrimosa dies! O sidus amarum!

Illa dies tua nox fuit, et Venus illa venenum!

Illa dedit vulnus, &c.

The most accessible account of Geoffrey and his work is in Thomas Wright's Biographia Britannica Literaria (Anglo-Norman Period), pp. 398 ff.

575 f. Friday: i.e. the day of Venus, Latin dies Veneris, OE. Frīgedæg, because the goddess Frīg was identified with Venus. Remember, too, that the sun was in Taurus, the 'house' of Venus.

584 ne hadde I: two syllables, the scansion being the same as for the contracted form nadde I. It might be better to read nadde here, for in l. 303 the different scansion shows that there is no contraction. Sentence = 'noble sentiments'.

585 as diden ye: Chaucer changes from the singular to the plural pronoun when it suits his rhyme. Generally the singular is used to address a divinity (e.g. 285, 576), a familiar or an inferior; the plural in polite and formal speech, as in ll. 1-39, 142-203. But there is a certain amount of crossing, e.g. maistow 340; thee 342, compared with ye, yow 355 f.; and too much should not be made of the distinction.

590 Ylioun, or Ilium: Troy, or perhaps its citadel. In Hous of Fame 151 ff. Chaucer sees depicted on the walls of the temple of glass the destruction of Troy—Sinon and the horse, the assault of Ilium, and the slaying of Priam by Pyrrhus. In both passages he follows the Aeneid, not the medieval version of the story found in Guido de Columnis, which is different in many details.

591 f. Pirrus with his streitè swerd Whan he, &c.

(i) Pirrus . . . whan he is a clumsy expression for Whan Pirrus . . . (ii) streitè seems to reflect Latin stricta (acie), but the words do not occur in Aeneid ii, 468 ff. where the slaying of Priam by Pyrrhus is described, though they are found at l. 334 of the same book. Guido de Columnis has ense nudo. (iii) In Virgil, Pyrrhus seized Priam by the hair—implicuitque coma laevam—not by the beard. There is nothing similar in Guido.

593 Eneydos: the Greek genitive with liber understood. Near the beginning of the Monk's Tale we have 'as Judicum can telle' where Judicum stands for liber Judicum 'the book of Judges'. Scan E/ne/y/dos (four syllables).

596 sovereynly: the Ellesmere MS. reads sodeynly, an obvious error of the copyist; for d in MSS. of the time is formed something like Greek δ, and ver is represented by v (or u) with a hook above it as a contraction for er. The two words are thus almost identical in script. Cp. note to 448.

597 ff. Hasdrubales wyf: this Hasdrubal was not the brother of Hannibal (d. B.C. 207), but the Carthaginian leader whom Scipio Africanus Minor defeated in B.C. 146. After a desperate resistance Hasdrubal gave himself up to save his life, and, indignant at his weakness, his wife threw herself and her sons into the flames. Chaucer reads her motive differently; cp. Franklin's Tale (F. 1399 ff.):

What shal I seyn of Hasdrubales wyf
That at Cartáge birafte hirsself hir lyf?

For whan she saugh that Romayns wan the toun,
She took hir children alle and skipte adoun
Into the fyr, and chees rather to dye
Than any Romayn dide hire vileynye.

His source is Jerome's contra Iovinianum, bk. i, a treatise written about the year 392 in answer to the heretic Jovinian, who argued that widows and wives were as meritorious as virgins. Jerome's treatise is referred to by the Wife of Bath (D. 674 f.) in a passage which may well describe a book in Chaucer's own library. It certainly was a favourite of his.

600 She: Hasdrubal's wife, not Pertelote.

604 f. Nero: Again one of the stories used by the Monk is mentioned without any backward reference (cp. l. 372 f. and note):

He Romè brende for his delicacie;
The senatours he slow upon a day
To heeren how men woldé wepe and crie.

Both passages are probably inspired by Boethius, bk. ii, metre 6: 'he leet brennen the cité of Rome, and made sleen the senatours'.

613 and bar: the preterite bar 'bore' is not logical here: modern English also would avoid the logical sequence with the present infinitive and bere, preferring the present participle 'bearing'.

617 Colle ... Talbot ... Gerland: Colle seems to have been a common name for a dog, and a diminutive of it may be the origin of collie. But it is also applied to persons, usually of low station, e.g. Colle the juggler in Hous of Fame 1277. Talbot and Gerland belong to the hunting tradition, for hounds were given very distinguished names ; cp. the short list in the Introduction, p. xxi ; and the very elaborate list in Roman de Renart, Branch v, 1187 ff. Talbot as a hound's name occurs in a fifteenth-century hunting song printed by Chambers and Sidgwick, Early English Lyrics, p. 245. Gerland is probably the Breton name of which Grelant is another form—not our word 'garland'.

618 Malkyn: a diminutive of Matilda, commonly used for a serving-maid. The distaff appears regularly in the chase of the Fox ; it is the rok of 'The False Fox' quoted in the note to l. 569 ff.

620 Sóre aferd for berkyng of the dogges : i. e. 'because of the barking'. The readings of the eight printed MSS. are :

(i) for berkyng of the dogges Ellesmere, Hengwrt, Corpus, Lansdowne ; for berkyng of dogges Harley 7334, Petworth ; for the berkyng of the dogges Cambridge Gg and Dd. The weight of evidence supports the first reading, and the others may be set aside as attempts to mend the metre.

(ii) sore aferd Corpus, Lansdowne, Petworth ; so fered Ellesmere, Hengwrt, Cambridge Dd ; for-fered Cambridge Gg ; so were they fered Harley 7334 (so Skeat, Pollard). for-fered may be rejected at once as bad idiom. The two groups, headed by Corpus and Ellesmere, and generally admitted to be independent witnesses in some degree, are here divided. But whereas the Ellesmere reading makes bad metre and doubtful idiom (the best defence would be to take it closely with l. 622, supplying that), the Corpus reading makes good metre and good idiom, for sore aferd (of) occurs in the Knight's Tale (A. 1518) and Legend of Good Women Prol. A. 53. It remains to consider the reading of Harley 7334, a very erratic MS. : it is clumsily phrased, makes a bad rhythm with the best established text of the rest of the line, and is pretty clearly a patching of so fered. I assume that the original reading was sore aferd ; that it was miscopied so ferd, and that all the other readings are attempts to mend the construction or the metre.

622 'it seemed to them that their hearts broke'—breek is preterite.

624 as men wolde hem quelle : 'as if they were being killed'—men is impersonal and best translated by the passive.

627 a benedicitee ; 'O bless us !' a very common exclamation ; benedicite is regularly scanned as three syllables, except in the Knight's Tale A. 1785 : The god of love, a benedicitee. The spelling bendistee is sometimes found in MSS., and gives the usual pronunciation.

628 he Jakké Straw : a construction natural enough in conversation, and very common in Chaucer. Thus within fifty lines (E. 1692 ff.) of the Merchant's Tale we have : That she this mayden . . . ; Nor he Theodamus . . . ; the wedding of hire Philologie and hym Mercurie.

Jack Straw was one of the leaders of the Peasants' Revolt in 1381, and he seems to have struck the imagination of contemporaries more than his colleague Wat Tyler did. The rebels planned a concentration on London, and their main forces were encamped on Blackheath by June 12th of that year. They began negotiations with the King's government to secure their aims, which were, in general, freedom from oppressive laws, customs and taxes. A strong party among the citizens favoured the rebels, and when the peasants entered the city, the jealousy of the London workmen and apprentices directed their attacks against foreigners, whose prosperity was their chief offence. The Flemings had been encouraged by Edward III, and they were principally concerned in the woollen trade as manufacturers, merchants and skilled artisans. They were ruthlessly beheaded by the mobs, who are said to have used the shibboleth 'bread & cheese' which Flemings called 'brode and kase'. The uproar was so hideous that it seems to have impressed all observers. June 14 was the chief day of the massacres. On the 15th Walworth the Mayor struck down Wat Tyler at Smithfield, and from that moment the vengeance of authority on the rebels began. According to Froissart Jack Straw and the priest John Ball 'were found in an old house hidden, thinking to have stolen away, but they could not, for they were accused by their own men. Of the taking of them the King and his lords were glad, and they strake off their heads, and Wat Tyler's also, and they were set on London Bridge.' Jack Straw's confession is reported by Walsingham Historia Anglicana (Rolls Series) ii, 9-10. So for a few days he flashes in and out of history. Two poems referring to him are in T. Wright's Political Poems and Songs (Rolls Series) i. 224 ff. For narratives of the Revolt, and the contemporary authorities, see Le Soulèvement des Travailleurs d'Angleterre en 1381, by A. Réville and C. Petit-Dutaillis, Paris 1898; and Oman The Great Revolt of 1381, Oxford 1906.

632 box: wood of the box-tree.

634 skriked: the variant shriked is perhaps the better reading, because Chaucer elsewhere has only shrighte &c. For some unexplained reason the OE. initial group scr- seems to yield ME. forms with shr- (which is the normal development) and with skr-; and here some MSS. have one and some the other. Note that the alternative form shrighte (l. 596) would not fill the verse.

641 if that I were as ye: 'if I were in your place', 'if I were you'.

642 as wys God helpe me! a regular form of asseveration, 'as sure (wys) as God may help me!': or it may be paraphrased 'truly, so help me God!'

642-679 The Nun's Priest's Tale

652 y-gon: the best MSS. have gon; igon is the reading of Harley 7334; agon would be in accord with Chaucer's usage, cp. l. 264. Not to be explained as omission of a syllable after the caesura, because here there is no pause.

664 do me to synge: 'cause me to sing'.

673 ff. Cp. with these lines the Preamble to the Parson's Tale, where the Host asks for a fable:

This Persouné answerede al at ones
 'Thou getest fable noon y-toold for me,
 For Poul, that writeth unto Thymothee,
 Repreveth hem that weyveth soothfastnesse,
 And tellen fables and swich wrecchednesse.
 Why sholde I sowen draf out of my fist
 Whan I may sowen whete, if that me list?
 For which I seye, if that yow list to heere Moralitye and vertuous mateere, &c.

Having told a fable, the Nun's Priest anticipates this very objection, and ingeniously quotes St. Paul, the same authority that the Parson quotes in the opposite sense!

673 As of a fox: here as is best interpreted according to the note to l. 102, and left out of account in construing.

675 Seint Poul seith: Romans xv. 4: Quaecumque enim scripta sunt, ad nostram doctrinam scripta sunt. The quotation in its context is hardly so sweeping. In the Retracciouns at the end of the Canterbury Tales, Chaucer writes: 'and if ther be anythyng that displese hem, I preye hem also that they arrette (impute) it to the defeaute of myn unkonnyng, and nat to my wyl . . . for oure boke seith "Al that is writen is writen for oure doctrine", and that is myn entente.'

On the forme Poul, see note to l. 14. The Ellesmere MS. has Paul here, and there is evidence elsewhere in Chaucer MSS. that the Latinized form was coming into use in citations from Scripture.

679 As seith my lord: a crux, which I cannot solve. What follows is simply discussion.

(i) On the general effect of ll. 678-80, note that Middle English secular compositions—Havelok for instance or Sir Gawain—usually close with a prayer, whether for the audience or the reciter or the composer. The practice is probably borrowed from sermons, in which it is established from an early date; in any event, it is inspired by the same spirit.

(ii) Chaucer follows the old tradition, so that a prayer is the normal ending of a completed tale, whatever may be the character of the story or its narrator. Three points are worth noting:— (1) The prayers at the end of the first three tales (Knight, Miller, Reeve) have a general likeness, as against all the rest. Perhaps these three tales were written, or were revised for inclusion in the Canterbury Tales, at about the same time. (2) The serious lines which appear so abruptly in the Pardoner's Tale (C. 916-8) are of this nature, making the true close of his sermon. Professor Kittredge's interpretation of them as the expression of a sudden emotional crisis (Chaucer and his Poetry, p. 216f.) does not take account of their formal purpose; though that purpose is consistent with sincerity. (3) The Parson's Tale has no such ending. But Chaucer's Retracciouns at the end of it spring from the same mood and the same tradition: they are the prayer for the author which naturally closes the whole work, and cannot be considered as an excrescence, still less as a last jape of the poet or as a forgery.

(iii) The ending of Chaucer's A, B, C, will help to distinguish general phrases from those that may be special to the Nun's Priest's Tale:

Now, Lady brihtè, sith thou canst and wilt Ben to the sede of Adam merciabe,
So bring us to that palais that is bilt
To penitents that ben to mercy able.

Here the first line is parallel to l. 679 (for it might be asserted of the Virgin Mary that she could and would help by intercession); the third and fourth cover l. 680, and show that so is not a correlative to as, but the polite imperative (cp. note to l. 177). In Troilus v, 1868 So make us, Jesus, for thy mercy digne, we get the equivalent of l. 679 without the crux. But As seith my lord is not comparable with anything in other endings. As seith (St. Poul, &c.) is the regular way of introducing a citation from authority; and since Chaucer always uses oure Lord = 'Jesus', my lord should refer to a lord in this world.

(iv) There is no real difficulty in the transition from Now goodè God 679 to his heighè blisse 680, for in a prayer to God, the confusion between direct address and address in the third person is natural enough.

(v) The Ellesmere and other MSS. contain a certain number of marginal explanatory notes, which are on the whole well-informed. Often they give references to Latin sources used, and quote the Latin in a form nearer to Chaucer's English than any known text is. Occasionally they are wrong or pointless, like the entry Petrus Comestor (the author of the twelfth-century Historia Scholastica) at l. 443 of our text. Opposite as seith my lord appears the note:

scilicet Dominus archiepiscopus Cantuariensis. Is this Chaucer's own explanation? Probably not, for no greater acumen than the earliest editors of Chaucer had, is required to guess a reference to the archbishop in the use of my lord by a priest on a Canterbury pilgrimage who could hardly have any other lord. Besides, it bears the stamp of the commentator's art, for while it seems to bring light, it really explains nothing: why should the archbishop be referred to here? It has been suggested that the archbishop of the time (William Courtenay 1381-96) may have had the absurd habit of qualifying every prayer with if be thy wille; but the parallel quoted above from the A, B, C must be reckoned with; the phrase is a common one usually meaning little more than 'please'; and even if it has a full sense, in the days when predestination and salvation by grace were orthodox doctrine (cp. note to l. 476), there would be nothing absurd in the prayer 'Make us all good, if it be Thy will'.

Other lines of solution are not successful. The prayer 'Make us all good men' seems to have no liturgical use which would associate it with the archbishop; and it is hardly satisfactory to assume that the Nun's Priest, feeling the need of some authority higher than his own to bless the company, uses the regular phrase for introducing an acknowledged authority, with words which the archbishop, as the head of the English Church, might say at the end of a sermon.

To sum up, if the marginal note is right, we do not know why the archbishop is referred to. If the note is wrong, as seith my lord is possibly a remnant of some use of the story in a different setting, without which the meaning is irrecoverable.

EPILOGUE: see note to l. 43 above.

CHAUCER'S ENGLISH

§ 1. Changes of Meaning.—The number of words in the Nun's Priest's Tale which have no representatives in Modern English is not really great—perhaps some fifty in all, and of these a few, e. g. bewray, hent, shent, maugree, are known as literary archaisms. The real difficulty lies not in them, but in many changes of meaning. Some are obvious enough, e. g. catel 'property' (not 'cattle') 61 n., rente 'revenues coming in' (not 'rent', which is an out-going payment for land, houses, &c.) 61 n., sentence 'opinions', &c. 211, departen 'part' 227, casuelly 'by accident' 335, stynthe 'stop' (not 'stint') 391; and others are more troublesome because they are not so obvious. Any one who is content to render his snowte smal 139, by 'his small snout', or rome 132, 414, by 'roam', or pasture 419 by 'pasture', is reading an imperfectly modernized version of Chaucer, for small, which once meant, 'slim', &c., has become more general in its meaning; roam has acquired a sense of spaciousness which forbids us to talk of a person roaming in a small chamber; and pasture then meant not only 'grass-land' or 'grass', but anything that is eaten, and the act of feeding itself. A reader who is constantly on the alert, and tries to give a precise meaning to each word or phrase, will find a new pleasure in Chaucer.

§ 2. Dialect.—Chaucer lived in London, and wrote in the East Midland dialect of London, which by his time was becoming the literary language of England. Hence his work is much easier to read than contemporary poems in other dialects, such as Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, Pearl, or Piers Plowman.

Note. It is important to examine the rimes, because scribes cannot easily alter them without being detected. They show a certain number of forms proper to the Kentish dialect, which extended westward as far as London. Thus an Anglo-Saxon etymological y became i in Northern Middle English, and in most of the Midlands; in the western districts of the South and Midlands it often appears as u; in Kentish it became e. Hence from Anglo-Saxon myrige we have normal Midland mirie, myrie,

The Nun's Priest's Tale

51, 305; West Midland murie 49, 85; and Kentish mery (in rime) 200. Here, exceptionally, modern English has standardized the Kentish form, instead of mirry. Again OE. styntan gives East Midland stinte and Kentish stente: the first appears at l. 391, the second in M.T. 745 (riming with sente); OE. lystan gives East Midland liste 510 and Kentish leste (riming with reste) 307. Sterte 601 (riming with herte) beside stirten 611, is probably to be explained in the same way. Keen 'kine' 65 (OE. cȳ pl.), is another Kentish form; see Glossary.

§ 3. Spelling and Pronunciation.—Chaucer's spelling would seem less strange if we were accustomed to read sixteenth- and seventeenth-century texts in their original form instead of in modernized editions. The spelling of a good MS. like the Ellesmere is fairly consistent, and roughly phonetic in the sense that a letter usually has some sound-value. Note that (1) k often stands for modern hard c, e. g. kan, koude. (2) -aun- is usual for modern -an- in borrowings from French, e. g. daunce 74, Chauntecleer 83, gouvernaunce 99, where -aun- represented the sound which we still have in launch, vaunt. (3) i and y are equivalent, cp. malencolie 167 and malencolye 180; but y is preferred in the neighbourhood of u, m, n, which are easily confused with i in script: hence regular his but hym, right but nyght. (4) ou and ow are alternatives, e. g. lowde 15, loude 540. (5) So are -ey- (-ei-), -ay- (-ai-), e. g. pray 27, prey 636; sovereyn 443, soverayn 581. (6) The long vowels ē, ā, ō are often doubled: somdeel 55, wheer 133, heel 184; estaat 9, taak 177, maad 590; moore 'more' 1, foond (OE. fānd) 63, oold 107.

Note. In jeet 'jet' 95, reed 'red' 136, noon 'none' 151, oon 218, hoot 'hot' 191, soond 'sand' 501, soong 'sang' 504, the long vowel has since been replaced by a short.

(i) Syllables.—Words have been shortened since Chaucer's day. He could not rime go: growe, because the infinitive gro|wé would be two syllables (see § 4 below); and his verse shows that the inflexions -ed, -es were normally syllabic (except in some long words), e. g. hertles 45, blam|ed 51. Notice that the suffix -ioun makes two syllables, e. g. a|vys|i|oun, con|clus|i|oun; and similarly pa|ci|ence 60, e|quy|nox|i|al 90.

(ii) Consonants.—There are no silent consonant symbols, except initial h in French words like habundant 159, where it does not prevent elision. Knyght and nyght, wroghte and roghte, wlat-som and lat, have distinct initial sounds. Lyte 'little' 166 rimes with bite, but could not rime with might because gh had still something of the sound heard in German ich or Scots loch. In all positions r is sounded, e. g. in rather, mordrour.

Language

(iii) Vowels.—The best rough rule is to follow the Continental pronunciation of Latin:—

(a) Short a, e, i, o, u are pronounced as in French patte, English pet, pit, pot, put.

Note. Short u is regularly spelt o when it occurs alongside m, n, i, u (= v), which in script are hard to distinguish from u (see the facsimile at p. 24). Hence som (OE. sum); son (OE. sunu 'son'); love (OE. lufu); above (OE. abusan); woned (OE. wunad 'dwelt'). Sometimes o is found in other positions, e.g. boter-flye (OE. buttur-) 24.

(b) Long ā, ī, ū are pronounced as in father, police, rude.

Note: Long ū is always spelt ou (ow) according to an Old French practice, e.g. lowde, bour, broun, bacoun.

Long ē and ō have both open and close sounds, which are usually distinguished in the rimes. Close ē was pronounced as in French 'été', open ē as in English 'air'; close ō as in French 'eau', open ō as in English 'oar'. The distinction of open and close sounds in Chaucer is often difficult.

Note: Long close ē is sometimes distinguished by the spelling ie, e.g. lief 113 (but levere 354). The modern spelling ea indicates that the word had open ē in Chaucer's time, e.g. in great, meal, beat (ME. greet, meel, bete); while modern ee usually represents the close vowel, e.g. in deep, feel, feet. So modern oo indicates ME. close ō, e.g. in sooty, sooth.

(iv) Accentuation.—In words of native origin the incidence of the stress accent is usually the same as in modern English. But words borrowed from French were in a transitional stage. In French the last stem-syllable of nouns is stressed rather more than the others, whereas in English nouns the first syllable carries a strong stress and the later syllables are relatively weak. Ultimately most borrowings from French followed the English rule, but in Chaucer they often retain their original accent, e.g. solás, cotáge, colóur, corál, prisóun. Occasionally the English method of accentuation is tried where it has not been maintained, e.g. réviers 211, modern reverse. Sometimes Chaucer takes advantage of the uncertainty to use the form that best suits his metre, e.g. senténc 36, but séntence 584; ministres 292, but ministres 277; and so with the old Norse compound *féláw*es 260, but félawe 264. In polysyllables like súffisaúnce 73, áventúre 233, it is difficult to say whether the first syllable or the third has the stronger stress.

Note. In English words like hevynesse 3, dawenyng 116, the rimes indicate a secondary stress on the suffix. We should expect -ness- and -ing- to be stronger in Chaucer than in modern English, because they are followed by a weak syllable -e, which gives contrast.

The Nun's Priest's Tale

§ 4. Inflexions.—For the most part the inflexions in Chaucer are similar to those of early modern English as they are recorded in the Prayer Book and the Authorized Version of 1611.

Final -e. But whereas in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries final -e is added or omitted almost at random by scribes and printers, in Chaucer's English it usually has a grammatical value and is pronounced as a distinct syllable. It represents an Old English unaccented vowel, whether final (as -a, -e, -o, -u) or followed in OE. by flexional -n, -m (as -an, -en, -on, -um); and it also represents Old French final -e.

Its commoner uses in inflexion are:—

- (i) In the plural of all adjectives (except polysyllables), e. g. rede lemes 164, blaké beres 169.
- (ii) In the singular of weak adjectives (see § 6 below), e. g. the greté superfluytee 161 n.
- (iii) In various verbal inflexions, particularly
 - (a) in the infinitive, e. g. to pleyé 40, gladé 45.
 - (b) in the 1st sing. pres. indicative, e. g. tellé 58.
 - (c) in the plural pres. indicative, e. g. syngé 435, spryngé 436.
 - (d) in the weak pa. t. sing. & pl., e. g. wenté 219, 381.
 - (e) in the strong pa. t. pl., e. g. ronné 622.
 - (f) in the subjunctive, e. g. helpé 642.
 - (g) in the strong past participle, e. g. understonde 114.

Note. In (a), (c), (e), (g) and the plurals under (d), -en is found as well as -e, e. g. heeren 7, desiren 147, flowen 625, faren 113, herden 610. Normally -e is used before a word beginning with a consonant, and -en before a word beginning with a vowel; but Chaucer uses the forms for metrical convenience, e. g. gronen in (three syllables) 120, but grone in (two syllables) 124. So at l. 266 fallen in has the variant reading falle in gret with the same number of syllables.

- (iv) As the ending of many adverbs, e. g. sooré 121, newé 283, fasté 321, loudé 567.

In the fifteenth century final -e was no longer regularly pronounced in the London dialect. The extant Chaucer manuscripts, which date from this time, do not always preserve it correctly; and early imitators like Lydgate and Hoccleve show by their broken rhythms that they did not understand this secret of his metre. Dryden and Pope were in the same case, and it was not till Tyrwhitt's great edition of 1775-8 that the importance of final -e was realized.

Language

§ 5. Nouns.—The regular endings are :—

	Singular.	Plural.
Nom. Acc.	—	-es.
Gen.	-es.	-es.
Dat.	-(e).	-es.

Note. (a) -es is a separate syllable as a rule, except in some longer words, e.g. messedayes 86, husbondes 606 (but housbondes 148 is three syllables).

(b) Some borrowings from French make the plural in -s, e.g. paramours 101, colours 102, replecciouns 157; cp. the variant to senatoures 605 (footnote). Note also the plural vers 'verses' 547.

(c) -is appears for -es in ceris, heeris 137 f., and the rime beryis : mery 199 f. indicates that the pronunciation was not very different from that in modern hors-es (pronounced -iz).

(d) eyen 139, 395, 539, &c. (OE. pl. ēagan) and toon 96 in rime (OE. pl. tān) retain an old plural ending, which is extended by analogy to doughtren 63 (OE. pl. dohtru or dohtor). But toos 565 (in rime) and doughtres 609 also occur. On keen 'kine' 65 see Glossary and § 2 above.

(e) -e often appears in spelling as the ending of the dative singular, but it is not often sounded, and it is hard to be sure that it had not crept into the nominative by analogy. A clear instance is in londe 113 riming with pp. understonde.

(f) Survivals are the gen. sg. fader 202 (OE. gen. sg. fæder), and the uninflected plural of some nouns with long stems in Old English, e.g. seven yeer oold 351 (OE. pl. gēar neuter), seven nyght oold 107 (OE. pl. niht fem.).

§ 6. Adjectives.—The adjective, which was to lose all trace of inflexion in the course of the fifteenth century, is still declined in Chaucer.

(i) The plural of adjectives ends in -e, which makes a syllable, e.g. redē lemes 164, ensamples oldē 340.

(ii) The singular of adjectives ends in -é when they follow the weak declension, e.g. the brightē sonnē 112, youre redē colera 162, Now, goodē God 678.

Note. (a) The weak form of the adjective is used chiefly after demonstratives like the, this, his, youre; and in the vocative.

(b) Polysyllables usually have no inflexion, e.g. fortunat 10.

(c) Note the shortening of the stem vowel in comparison : whitler 97, gretteste 218.

(d) The adjective is postponed, under French influence, in lif present 215.

§ 7. Pronouns.

(i) 3rd PERSON.—The personal pronoun of the third person is in the plural Nom. they, Poss. hir(e), Obj. hem. Thus of the three forms that English borrowed from Norse (they, their, them), only the first had been adopted in the London dialect up to the end of the fourteenth century.

The Nun's Priest's Tale

Note. (a) The possessive pl. hir(e) 'their' 530, 606, is in form the same as the fem. sing. poss. & obj. hir(e) 61, 68, 71, 502.

(b) his is the possessive of it, as well as of he, e.g. 'the sonne in his ascencioun' 190; and his is spelt with final -e (never pronounced) when it is a plural, e.g. l. 137. Perhaps his toon 96 should be corrected.

(ii) 2ND PERSON.—The singular pronouns thow, thee, are still used in familiar talk (e.g. ll. 324–31), or in addressing God, e.g. 284 f. The polite plurals ye, yow are preferred in more formal language, e.g. l. 2, or when an inferior addresses his superior, e.g. l. 264. But there is a border line in which the distinction is not strictly observed; see note to l. 585. Yow obj. is not confused with ye nom.; see ll. 179–203.

(iii) RELATIVE.—That is the usual relative, e.g. by hevene-kyng that for us alle dyde 30, two men that wolde 301.

Which sg., whiche pl., is also used, both of persons, e.g. 58, and of things, e.g. 67 and perhaps 101. It is also found combined with that, e.g. Catoun which that was 174, or preceded by the: herbes . . . The whiche han 186.

Who is not used as a relative in Chaucer, but the oblique cases whos and whom are so used throughout Middle English.

§ 8. Verbs.—

(i) THE PRESENT INDICATIVE.

Singular.	Plural.
i(ch) com-e	we com-e(n)
thou com-(e)st	ye com-e(n)
he com-(e)th	they com-e(n)

Note. (a) The plural -e(n) is the characteristic inflexion of the Midland dialect (Southern dialects have -(e)th, Northern -(e)s). e(n) is proved for the original by the rimes at ll. 85 f. (see the note) and 281 f. On the use of -en or e see § 4 note, above.

(b) (e)th is proved for the original by rimes like feith : seith 145 f. The modern ending of the third person singular in -(e)s had not yet reached the London dialect from the North.

(ii) THE IMPERATIVE PLURAL, which may be used politely where a single person is addressed, ends in -eth or -e, e.g. trusté 258, Herkneth . . . And se 435 f.

(iii) THE PAST TENSE of strong verbs sometimes shows distinctions between singular and plural stems which are now lost, e.g.

Language

sg. fond 269, foond 63 (OE. fánd), but pl. founde 282. But Chaucer uses both they ronné (the true plural form) 622 and they ran 615 (in rime, the true singular form) as it suits his convenience. So in the preterite-present shal, the plural is usually shul (OE. sculon), but the true singular form shal is also used in the plural ye shal 181. Conversely he uses besides the true pa. t. sg. bar (OE. bær) 613 and brak (OE. bræc) 650, the sg. forms beer 570 and breek 622, which take their vowels from the plurals, OE. bæron, bræcon.

(iv) THE PAST PARTICIPLE often retains its old prefix y- (OE. ge-), though Gower, who was Chaucer's contemporary and friend, avoids this form altogether. Examples are y-seyled 333, y-ronne 428. In strong verbs the pp. ends in -(e)n or -e, e.g. understonde 114, founden 212, slawe 248, slayn 256, y-founde 416, y-doon 654, writen 675, y-write 676.

The remaining verbal forms present little difficulty, and their subsequent history is comprised in the loss of inflexional -e, -en; the loss of distinctive forms of the 2nd person singular; and the loss of the subjunctive.

§ 9. Syntax.—It is impossible to give a brief survey of Chaucer's syntax, and special constructions have therefore been explained in the notes. But, in general, the syntax of literary English has become more and more logical and rigid under classical influences, whereas Chaucer still retains much of the freedom of conversation.

NOTE ON THE METRE

In this tale Chaucer uses a metre that is not found in English before his time—the rimed couplet in which the typical line has five stresses. He seems to have borrowed the rhythm from Italian models like Dante and Boccaccio, and to have realized at once its advantages over the couplet of four-stressed lines which is usual in Old French poets and their English imitators of the fourteenth century.

If stressed syllables are represented by — , and unstressed by $\times$, the normal line is $\times \text{—} | \times \text{—} | \times \text{—} | \times \text{—} | \times \text{—} (\times)$

e. g. Is right | ynóugh | to múch|è fólk | I géss-è 4
 Iir bórd | was sérv|ed móost | with whít | and blák 77

(1) That final -e at the line end (as in gessé) makes a syllable is proved by the grammar, and by such rimes as Romé : to me Prol. 671 f.; yowthe : aLOW the (= thee) F. 675 f.; time : by me G. 1204 f.

(2) Most of the devices used in later poetry to avoid monotony are to be found in Chaucer, e. g. inverted stress in substitution of weak syllables for strong in

Cómth of | the grét|è sú|perflú|ytée 161;

That shul | been for | yourè héelè | and for | yourè prów 184;

substitution of secondary accents (here represented by ') for unaccented syllables in Milk and | bróun brèed | in which | she fóond | no lák 78;

and trisyllabic feet in

Pékkè hem ùp | right as | they grówè | and éte | hem ýn 201 or

And in | this cártè | héerè he llth | gápyng | upright 276.

(3) One licence—the omission of the first syllable so that the line seems to be a syllable short—is disconcerting to a modern reader, e. g.

Or | an á|gu that | may be | yourè bán-è 194

Sóre | aférd | for bérk|yng of | the dóggès 620

Ták|eth the | morál|ité | goóde mèn 674.

Note. In ll. 162, 553 the difficulty is avoided if final -e of yourè is made syllabic; but it is usually silent, and the point requires more investigation. In l. 548 that may have been added in the Ellesmere MS. to mend the metre.

Note on the Metre

(4) Elision of final -e is indicated in the above examples by a dot under the elided -e. It occurs before a following vowel or a weak h; cp.

A pów|rè wýd|wé sóm|deel stápe | ín ág-è 55
This wýd|wé of which | I téll|è yow | my tál-è 58

Note too—also of 17, she and 64, to habundant 159, the A|vis|oun 357, the oldé 362, t'espye 522, suff're hym 580.

(5) Words containing e + a liquid or nasal in the second syllable, e. g. nevere, evcre, siker, swevene, seven, hevene, owene ('own') are usually treated as nevre, swevne, sevn, &c. Cp. the scansion of seven(e) in ll. 100, 107, 351; and note colere and (2 sylls.) 180, siker as (2 sylls.) 397; never erst (2 sylls.) 515. Words like symple, cronycle often make a syllable less than we should expect, e. g. in ll. 442, 479.

(6) On number of syllables see Chaucer's Language, § 3, (i) above, and note Ma/cro/be/us 357, Dan/i/el 362, E/ne/y/dos 593.

(7) On accentuation, see ibid., §. 3, (iv).

(8) On variant forms used for metrical convenience. see note to l. 318 f., and Chaucer's Language § 3, (iv); § 4 note; § 5, note (d); § 8, (iii) and (iv).

(9) The MSS. usually mark a pause within the line, but it is not essential. In this tale most of the lines end with a pause; but note the over-running of the sense in ll. 344-60. The verse-paragraph is skilfully built, and Chaucer prefers to begin a paragraph with the second line of a couplet, so that the transition is less abrupt. The paragraphing of the Ellesmere MS. is shown in the text.

These brief notes do not profess to give an adequate account of Chaucer's metrical usage. They are intended to set a beginner in the way of reading for himself, and reaching his own interpretation of the rhythm through practice.

GLOSSARY

Not all the words in the text are given, nor all the references to the words included; but an attempt has been made to distinguish the many slight changes of meaning that have occurred since Chaucer's time; and students are recommended to test their interpretations by reading through the Glossary. The formation of English compounds is usually marked, but etymological notes are sparingly given, because they do not always help in the interpretation of the text. The following contractions are used:—OE. = Old English; OFr. = Old French; ON. = Old Norse; ME. = Middle English; N.E.D. = The Oxford English Dictionary; sb. = substantive; pa.t. = past tense; pp. = past participle; imper. = imperative; impers. = impersonal. M. before a line reference shows that it comes from The Monk's Tale; n. after a line reference shows that there is a note on the passage. The remarks on Spelling (p. 62) should be noted.

abhomynable, adj. unnatural, 287.

a-bove, adv. above, upwards, 187.

a-brayde, pa.t. woke with a start, 242.

a-byde, v. wait, 290, 314.

accord, sb. harmony, 113.

accordant (to), adj. in keeping (with), 70.

actes, sb. pl. histories, records, 370.

a-ferd, pp. adj. frightened, afraid, 153, 620, 655.

afferme, v. maintain the truth of, 359.

affrayed, pp. frightened, afraid, 512, 519. [OFr. affrayer.]

a-fright, pp. adj. afraid, 129.

after, prep. according to, 469; adv. afterwards, 360.

a-gaste, v. terrify, 322; pp. adj.

agast, frightened, 123, 150.

a-gayn, prep. exposed to (sun), 503; towards (evening, &c.), 306, 312; adv. back: turne agayn, return, 448, 643.

a-go(n), pp. gone, past, 264, 440.

a-grief, adv. ill, unkindly (lit. in grief), 127 n.

agu, sb. ague, 194.

al, adv. quite, 211, 283, 383; intensive, 463. See al-so.

al-day, adv. constantly, 326 n.

als, adv. also, 20. See al-so.

al-so (. . . as), conj. as . . . as, 397, 445.

altercacioun, sb. wordy strife, 471.

al-wey, -way, adv. always, M. 773, 285.

an-hanged, pp. hanged, M. 765, 296, 374.

an-on, adv. forthwith, 43, 263, 511 [lit. 'in one'].

anoye, v. weary, displease, 23 n.

(a)poplexie, sb. apoplexy, an effusion—usually of blood—in the head, 75.

areest, sb. arrest, seizure, 134.

argument, sb. formal proof, 216.

a-right, adv. favourably, 130.

arrayed, pp. disposed, 271.

arwes, sb. pl. arrows, 164 n.

as, conj. as; see 102 n., 673 n., 177 n., M. 753 n.; as it were, like, 94, 413, 270 n. See al-so.

ascencioun, sb. ascension; rising above the horizon, 89; increasing altitude of the sun as the summer comes on, 190 n.

asure, sb. azure; lapis lazuli, 96.
attame, v. open, begin on, 52.
 [OFr. aiamer 'broach a new cask', &c.] atte = at the, 247.
attempre, adj. moderate, 72.
auctorité, sb. authority, 209.
auctour, sb. author, authority, 218 n., 497.
avauntour, sb. braggart, 151.
aventure, sb. luck, 233; adventure, 420. [ad- became common in the sixteenth century.]
avoy! exclam. alas! 142.
a-vysioun, sb. vision, 348, 357, 386.
a-wait, sb. ambush, 459 n.

bad, pa.t. (of bidle) begged, 350.
bane, sb. slayer, death, 194.
bar, pa.t. sg. (of bere) bore; carried, 613 n.; behaved, 106. See beer.
batailled, pp. adj. embattled, cre-nellated, 94.
beer, pa.t. sg. (of bere) bore, 570. See bar. [OE. pa. t. pl. bærou.] bemes, sb. pl. beams (in a roof), 176.
bemes, sb. pl. trumpets, 632.
bene, sb. bean, worthless thing, 48.
benedicitee, exclam. bless us, 627 n. [Lat. imper. benedicite.] berd, sb. beard, 154, 592.
bere, sb. bear, 169.
berk-ying, sb. barking, 620.
berys, sb. pl. berries, 199.
beth, imper. pl. be, 564.
bi-fel, pa.t. (of bifalle) impers. it happened, 235, 425, 507.
bi-forn, adv. before, 377.
bi-gan, pa.t. began; with infin., M. 760 n.
bi-gyle, v. beguile, fool, 662.
bi-knewe, pa.t. (of biknowe), confessed, 295.
bi-tokne, v. betoken, M. 762.
bi-twixe, prep. between, 136, 552.
bi-wreie, v. reveal, 285.

blis-ful, adj. blessed, holy, 284; merry, happy, 431, 435.
bole, sb. bull, 169.
boon, sb. bone, 633; blood and bones, alliterative tag = all my body, 661.
bord, sb. table, 77.
boter-flye, sb. butterfly, 24, 508.
botme, sb. bottom, 335.
bour, sb. bower, bed-room, 66 n.
box, sb. boxwood, 632.
brak, pa.t. broke, 650. See breck. [OE. pa. t. sg. bræc.] brasile, sb. a red dye from which Brazil takes its name, Epilogue (note to l. 43).
brast, pa. t. (of breste) burst, 452.
braunes, sb. pl. brawn, muscles, Epilogue (note to l. 43).
breed, sb. bread, 78.
breck, pa.t. sg. broke, 622. See brak. [OE. pa. t. pl. bræcon.] breest, sb. chest, Epil. (n. to l. 43).
brøn, sb. bran, 474 n.
brid, sb. bird, 115, 435.
brend, brent, pp. (of brenne) burnt, 599, M. 740; pa.t. brende, 602, 604.
brouke, adj. enjoy (use of), 534 n.
bulte, v. bult, sift, 474 n.
burned, pp. adj. burnished, 98.
but, conj. except, M. 773, 484; *un-*less, 51.
butiller, sb. butler, 368.
by, adv. beside (her), 502.
byde, v. wait, 319. See abyde.
byle, sb. bill (of a bird), 95.
by-nethe, adv. beneath, downwards, 187.

cas, sb. (mis)chance, 438.
caste, v. cast, 427; casten hem, resolved, 309 n.
casuel-ly, adv. by accident, 335.
catel, sb. property, 61 n.
centaure, sb. centaur, 197 n.
certes, adv. verily, assuredly, 146.
certeyn, adj. (a)certain, 302, 469; adv. certainly, 551, M. 765.

chapitre, sb. chapter, 299.
cherl, sb. churl, rustic, 643.
choys, sb. choice, 480.
chuk, sb. cluck (of a cock), 408.
chukke, v. cry 'chuck', cluck, 416.
clappe, v. talk, prate, 15. [Metaphor from a bell.]
clepe, v. call, name, 104, 479.
clerk, sb. scholar, esp. one in holy orders, 469.
clokke, sb. clock, 88.
clomben, pp. climbed, 432.
cloos, adj. closed, shut, 566.
clos, sb. enclosure, yard, 594.
cold, adj. baneful, 490 n.
col-fox, sb. fox with black markings, 449. [lit 'coal-fox', found only here in English; but rare German kohl-fuchs, Dutch kool-vos, and the description, prove the meaning. Examples of its use as a proper name in Publ. Mod. Lang. Ass. xxxix, 762 ff.]
colera, colere, sb. cholera, the choleric humour, 162 n., 180.
coleryk, adj. choleric, having an excess of choleric humour, 189 n.
commune, sb.: as in commune, in common, commonly, 234.
compaignable, adj. friendly, 106.
compaignye, sb. company, 227.
compleyne, v. lament, 19, 583.
condicioneel, adj. conditional, 484.
See note to ll. 477-84.
compleccioun, sb. mingling of humours, 158 n., 189 n.
congregacioun, sb. assembly, 222.
conseil, sb. advice, 487; secrets, 522 n.
conseille, v. counsel, advise, 179.
oontek, sb. bloody quarrel, 166.
contrarie, sb. opposite, 514.
contree, sb. country, 302.
oomen, pa.t. pl. came, arrived, 221.
coral, sb. red coral (from Red Sea and Mediterranean), 93.
corn, sb. grain of corn, 409.
cote, sb. cottage, 70.

countrefete, v. imitate, equal, 555.
cours, sb. voyage, 333.
cride(n), pa.t. cried, 511, 605.
cronyele, sb. chronicle, 442. [Ofr. cronique < Latin chronica < Gk. χρονικά 'annals'. The suffix le is due to confusion with article, &c.] curteys, adj. courteous, 105.

damoysele, sb. damsel, mistress, 104.
dar, pret. pres. dare, 192; pa.t. dorste, 152.
daun, sb. master, 26 n., 205, 367, 546, 568.
dawen-yng, sb. dawning, 116.
debonaire, adj. gracious, gentle, 105 [Ofr. de bonne aire].
dede, adj. wk. dead, 272, 283.
deel, sb. part, bit; every deel completely, 349; never a deel not at all, 390, 483.
deere, adj. dear, 123, 240, 339.
deigne, v. deign, impers. 415.
delit, sb. delight, 579 [Ofr. delit, now modified by confusion with light, &c.].
delyver-ly, adv. deftly, smartly, 650.
departen, v. part (company), 227.
desport, sb. amusement, 25.
devyse, v. describe, 272.
deye, sb. dairy-keeper, 80.
deye, v. die, 140; pa.t. dyde, 30.
deyntee, adj. dainty, delicate, 69.
diffye, v. set at nought, 405; denounce, 390.
digestyves, sb. pl. medicines that help digestion, 195 n.
discrecioun, sb. sagacity, good judgement, 543, 552.
disee, sb. pain, 5.
disputisoun, sb. disputation, debate, 472.
dissymulour, sb. dissembler, 462.
divyne, v. suppose, 500 n.
do, v. do, cause, 664 n.; cause (to

- be), 254 n.; han to do of deal with, 485; do no fors of attach no weight to, 175.
- doctour, sb. teacher, doctor; esp. one of the four great 'doctors' of the Western Church, viz. Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Gregory, 475.
- doctrine, sb. instruction, edification, 676.
- doghtren, sb. pl. daughters, 63; doghtres, 609.
- doke, sb. duck, 624.
- dong-carte, sb. dung-cart, 270.
- donge, sb. dung, 252.
- donge, v. to manure, 270.
- dorste, pa.t. (of dar) durst, 152.
- doute-lees, adv. without doubt, assuredly, 141, 342.
- dradde, pa.t. (of drede), M. 738 n.
- drecched, pp. distressed (by dreams), 121.
- drede, sb. dread, 640.
- drede(n) (of) v. dread, 163; pa.t. dradde, M. 738 n.
- dreynt, pp. (of drenche), drowned, 316.
- dwelle, v. tarry, 384.
- dych, sb. ditch, 82.
- dyde, pa.t. (of d(e)ye) died, 30.
- dyghen, v. dye, Epilogue (n.tol.43).
- dystaf, sb. distaff: a cleft stick on which wool was wound in hand-spinning, 618.
- ech, adj. each, 89.
- eek, eke, adv. also, M. 750, 407.
- eeris, sb. pl. ears, 137.
- eet, pa.t. (of ete) ate, 67.
- effect, sb. significance, consequences, 369.
- ellebor, black hellebore, 197 n.
- elles, adv. else, 27, 170.
- endite, v. compose, express in writing, 441.
- engendren (of), v. spring (from), 157.
- engyne, v. rack, 294.
- ensample, sb. example, 340.
- entente, sb. purpose, 220, 657.
- equynoxial, sb. celestial equator, 90 n.
- er, adv. and conj. before, 196, 235.
- erst, adv. previously, 515.
- eschewe, v. avoid, evade, 572.
- ese, sb. comfort, happiness, 6, 531.
- espye, v. spy upon, 522.
- estaat, sb. condition (of life), 9.
- everemo, adv. for evermore, 49.
- ever-ich-on, from. every one, 53.
- experience, sb. the test of practice; actual observation, 212.
- expowne, v. expound, 349.
- ey, sb. egg, 79. [OE. æg; eggr ON.]
- eyle, v. impers. ail, 124, 334.
- fader, gen. sg. father's, 202 n.
- faire, adv. well, elegantly, 106, 441.
- falle, v. fall; happen, 366; as it wolde falle 'as chance appointed', 229. See fil.
- faren, pp. (of fare), gone, 113.
- faste, adv. (rapidly), volubly, 321 n.
- fayn, adj. glad, delighted, M. 751; adv. gladly, 532.
- feend, sb. fiend, 520, 623.
- felawe, sb. friend, comrade, 219.
- felonye, sb. crime, 274.
- fer, adj. far, 302; adv., 231 n.
- fil, pa.t. sg. (of falle), befell, 310, 438.
- flatour, sb. flatterer, 559.
- flaugh, pa.t. (of flye), flew, 465. See 406 n.
- flee, v. fly, 176 [OE. flēon].
- fleigh, pa.t. sg. (of flye) flew, 573, 651. See fly.
- flour, sb. flower, 97.
- floweren, pa.t. pl. (of flye) flew, 625. See fly, slaugh.
- fly, pa.t. flew, 406 n.
- folye, sb. silly thing, 672.
- foond, fond, pa.t. sg. (of fynde) found, 78, 258, 269; provided for, 63; pl. founde, discovered, 282; pp. y-founde, 416; founden, 212. [OE. pa. t. sg. fānd, pl. fūndon.] for, prep. for; because of, 31, 620; against, 351 n.; with to + infin. M. 764 n., 13, 343, &c.; conj. because, 548; since, 533; so that, 181; for that because M. 747, 606.

forn-cast, pp. foreseen, 451 n.
fors, sb. force; ne do no fors of attach no importance to, 175.
for-slewthen, v. lose by sloth, 330.
forther-more, adv. moreover, 361.
for-wit-yng, sb. foreknowledge, 477. See forwoot.
for-woot, pret. pres. foreknows, 468, 482. See forwityng.
for-yete, v. forget, 188. [OE. for-gietan; modern (for)get < ON. geta.] foul, adj. dirty, ill-groomed, ugly, 47.
free, adj. generous, 148, 503.
freend, sb. friend, 519.
fro, prep. from, 406. [OE. fram, m dropped before following consonant.]
ful, adv. intensive: very, M. 767, 168, 189; ful wo, 172 n.
fume, sb. vapours, 157 n.
fumetere, sb. fumitory, 196 n. [Lat. fumus terræ; the modern suffix is due to confusion.] fy, exclam. fie! 125, 142.
fyn, adj. fine, choice, 93.

gabbe, v. tell lies, 300.
galtrys (beryis), sb. pl. buck-thorn (?), 199 n. [OE. gāle hrīs*, goat's bush, influenced by ON. geit.]
galwes, sb. pl. gallows, M. 744.
game, sb. sport, fun, 25, 496.
gan, v. with infin. forms a preterite, 112, 237, 266, 307 n., &c.
gape, v. gasp in agony, or open the mouth in death, M. 744; pres. p. gapyng, 276 n.

gargat, sb. throat, 569. [OFr. gargate.]
gentil, adj. gentle, high-born, 99.
gentillesse, sb. kindness, courtesy, 530.
gesse, v. guess, think, 4.
gilt, sb. guilt, 607.
glade, v. gladden, 45.
glad-ly, adv. eagerly; usually, 458.
glad-som, adj. delightful, 12.
go(n), v. go; walk, 50 n.; (of organs) play, 86.
governance, sb. control, 99; self-control, 668.
grace, sb. (good) fortune, 393; M. 743 n.
graunt mercy (of), exclam. (grace-mercy), thank you (for). [OFr. grant merci 'great thanks'.] greet, adj. great, 206; gretteste, superl., 218 n.
greve, sb. grove, 57 n.
greyn (of Portyngale), sb. a scarlet dye from Portugal, Epilogue (note to l. 43).
grote, sb. groat, fourpenny-bit, 192. [Dutch groot.]
grym, adj. fierce, 413.

ha! ha! cry to raise alarm, start a chase, &c., 615.
habounde, v. abound, M. 758 [h silent].
habundant, adj. abundant, 159 [h silent].
han, v. have, 134; pres. pl. 2, &c. hap, sb. luck, M. 748.
happe, v. impers. happen, 221.
hardy, adj. brave, bold, 148, 273.
harrow, exclam. a cry for help, 279, 614. [OFr. harou.] haven-syde, sb. shore of a haven, 305.
heed, sb. head, 75, 646.
heeld, pa. t. (of holde) held, 566.
heele, sb. health, healing, 184.

- heere, adv. here, 297, 375.
heere(n), v. hear, 7, 21; pa. t. herde, 18.
heeris, sb. pl. hairs, 138. [OE. (Anglian) hēr; modern hair is from ON. hár.]
heet, pa. t. (of hote) was called, 83 n. See highte.
hegge, sb. fence, 452.
heigh, adj. high, exalted, M. 758, 680.
heighe, adv. high, 651.
heled, pp. (of hele), concealed, 289.
hem, pron. pl. obj. them, 165, &c.
hente, v. seize; pa. t. 569, 656; pp. 293, 592.
herbergage, sb. accommodation, lodging, 223.
herbe-yve, sb. herbive, coronopus (?) 200 n.
herkne, v. hark, 310 n., 444.
herte, sb. heart, 108; of herte, from the heart, 537; herte deere, beloved, 123.
herte-lees, adj. coward(ly), 142.
herte-ly, adv. with all (my) heart, 27.
hevene-kyng, sb. King of heaven, 30.
hevy-nesse, sb. sadness, 3, 21.
hewe, sb. hue, 257.
hewed, pp. adj. coloured, 103.
highte, pa. t. (of hote) is or was called, 65, 422. See heet.
hir(e), pron. fem. poss. her, 61, 502; objective hire, 71, 74; with impers. verbs, 68; see 12 n.; herself, 501; pl. poss. their, 163, 186, 530, 564, 606, 622.
hir-selven, pron. reflex. herself, 602.
hoo! exclam. stop! 1.
hoold, sb. keeping, 108 n.
hooly, adj. holy, pure, 353.
hoot, adj. hot, 191.
hostelrye, sb. inn, 228.
hostiler, sb. inn-keeper, 263.
hound, sb. dog, 134.
ho(u)s-bondē, sb. husband, 148, 606.
housbondrie, sb. economy, 62.
howpe, v. whoop, 634.
humour, bodily moisture, 159; cp. 162 n.
hyder, adv. hither, 44.
hydous, adj. hideous, 627.
hye, adv. high, 565. See heighe.
hym, pron. obj. sg. him; himself, 244, M. 738 n.; dat. with *im-*personal verbs, see 12 n. See hem, hir(e).
in, sb. inn, 260.
jade, sb. wretched nag, 46.
jangle, v. chatter, 669.
jape, sb. a trick, mock, illusion, 325.
jeet, sb. jet, 95.
jolif, adj. blithe, cheerful, 308. [Modern jolly has lost final f.]
kan, pret. pres. can, know how to, M. 745, 173; pl. konne, 155; pa. t. koude, 115.
katapuce, sb. catapuce, 199 n. keen, sb. pl. cows, 65. [OE. cū, pl. cȳ; ME. pl. kyn (whence kine), but Kentish keen.] keep, sb. heed, 244.
kepe, v. guard (himself), 350; watch over, 278.
konne, pret. pres. pl. can, 155.
koude, pa. t. (of kan) could, 115. [l in modern could is due to influence of would.]
kyn, sb. kin, lineage, 202.
kynde, sb. nature, instinct, 186, 430.
ladde, pa. t. (of lede) led, M. 740.
lak, sb. lack, shortage, 78.
large, adj. ample, 393; broad, Epilogue (note to l. 43).
lat, imper. (of lete), let, allow, 41, 391; lat se, 555 n. [See note to l. 74.]

latter, adj. compar. latter; latter ende, end, 439.

lawriol, sb. spurge laurel, 196 n.

leere, v. learn, 340.

legende, sb. legend, 355 n.

lemes, sb. pl. flames, 164.

lene, adj. lean, 47.

lenger, adv. compar. longer, 268.

[OE. lengra, mutated compar. of long adj.]

leoun, sb. lion, 413.

lese, v. lose, 376, 550; pp. lorn, 378.

leste, v. impers. it pleased, 307. See liste.

lette, v. trans. hinder, stop, 74 n.; postpone, 318; intrans. delay, 268, 323 n.

leve, v. leave, 419.

levere, adj. compar. rather, 354 n.

leye, v. lay (a wager), bet, 192.

lief, sb. lover, 113.

ligge(n), v. lie (in ambush, &c.), 459; lye, 239; 3rd sg. pres. indic. lith. 276.

light-ly, adv. quickly, 173.

liste, v. impers. it pleased, 510; leste, 307. [OE. lystan; Kentish lestan.]

lite, sb. little (time), 347. [OE. lyt.]

lith, sb. limb, 109 n.

logge, sb. (lodge), abode, 87.

logged, pp. lodged, 232.

logg-yng, sb. lodging, 229.

loken, pp. locked, held fast, 109 n.

lond, sb. land, 270; in londe, far away, 113 n.

loore, sb. teaching; wisdom, learning, 204, 430, 584.

lorn, pp. lost. See lese.

losengeour, sb. false flatterer, 560.

lowde, adv. loudly, 15.

lust, sb. inclination, 40.

lyk, adj. like, 96, 98.

lyte, adj. little; gret and lyte, 'of all kinds', 166. See lite.

maad, pp. made, 134, 590.

maister, sb. master, 581.

maistow = mayst thou, 340.

malencolie, sb. melancholy (humour), 167, 180.

man, sb. and indef. pron. man; one, 121 n.

maner, sb. kind (of), M. 771, 80 n.

mateere, sb. matter, subject, 472, 485.

maugree, prep.: maugree youre heed (lit. in despite of your head), in spite of all you can do, 646.

maze, sb. delusive thing, 327.

mervaille, sb. marvel, 310.

mery, adj. pleasant; ther mery is where it is pleasant, 200 n. [OE. myrige, Kentish merige.]

meschaunce, sb. mischance, 575.

meschief, sb. trouble, 128.

messe-dayes, sb. pl. mass-days; feast-days on which a layman must hear mass, 86.

mette, pa. t. (of mete) dreamt, M. 750 n., 236, 267, 317, 346, 373; impers. 128, 132, 312; pp. met, 160.

meynee, sb. following, 628.

ministre, sb. officer responsible for administration of law, 277, 292.

mooder, sb. mother, 530.

moost, adv. superl. for the most part, 77.

moot(e), v. may, 50, 210, 534; pa. t. moste, q. v.

moralité, sb. moral (lesson), 674.

mordre, sb. murder, 285 ff.

mordred, pp. murdered, 239, 275.

mordrour, sb. murderer, 460.

morwe, sb. morning, 259, 464, 488.

morwen-yng, sb. morning, 536.

morwe-tyde, sb. morning, 250.

moste(n), pa. t. (of moot) had (to), 226, 540.

muchel, adv. much, 3.

multiplie, v. make (the world) populous, 579.

murie, adj. merry, 49; pleasant to hear, musical, sweet-toned, 85 ; compar. murier, 504. See mery.

myrie, adj. merry, 51, 202 ; happy, 493 ; sweet, 525 ; pleasantly-situated, 305. See mery, murie.
myri-ly, adv. pleasantly, 506 ; with enjoyment, 501.

na-mo, no more, 64 n.
na-moore, no more, 1, 663.
narwe, adj. small, not roomy, 56.
nas = ne was, was not, 84, 245.
nat, adv. not, 24, 300.
na-the-less, adv. none the less, 205, 381.
ne, negative particle no, not, nor, &c., 19, 25 ; negative doubled for emphasis, 76, 574 ; combined with verbs as noot = ne woot, nys, nas, neré.
nede-ly, adv. necessarily, 478 f.
nedes, adv. necessarily, 468.
neer, adv. compar. nearer, 44.
nekke-bon, sb. neck(-bone), 296.
neré = ne were, past. subj. were (it) not (for), 28.
never(e), adv. never, 32 ; not (at all), 17.
newe, adv. freshly, 283.
noght, adv. not, 481.
nones, for the nones, for the nonce, for the occasion, 567. [ME. for than ones, older for than ane
 'for that one (time)', where than is OE. þæm, dat. of def. art.]
nonne, sb. nun, 43 n.
noon, pron. adj. none, no, 35, 216.
noot, pret. pres. = ne woot, know not, 17, 334, 494.
norice, sb. nurse, 349.
notabilitee, sb. thing worthy of note, 443.
no-thing, adv. not at all, 74, 510.
noyse, sb. noise, 627.
ny, adv. nigh, near, 384 ; compar.
neer, 44.
nyce, adj. foolish, 549. [OFr. nice < Lat. nescius.]

nygard, sb. niggard, miser, 149.
nyght, sb. seven-nyght (old) (sen-night), week, 107.
nys = ne ys is not, 551.

o, oon, pron. adj. one, 224, 393 ; 218 n., 433. See ones.
of, prep. of ; from, 386, 537 ; by, 382, 590 ; for, 204, 274 ; concerning, 362 n., 563. See 84 n., 163 n., 218 n., 553 n. on, prep. on ; with remembre, 267.
 See 470 n.
ones, adv. once, 568, 662. See nones.
oother, pron. adj. other ; that oother, the second, 232 [hence the other].
organ, sb. organ, 85 n.
orlogge, sb. clock, 88. [OFr.
orloge < late Lat. horologium.] out! exclam. (come) out ! a cry for help, &c., 614.
outre-ly, adv. utterly, 463.
out-sterre, past. rushed out, 281.

paramours, sb. pl. mistresses, 101.
pardee, exclam. by God ! assuredly 18, 162. [OFr. par Dē.]
parfit, adj. perfect, 470 n. [OFr.
parfit, now remodelled after Lat.
perfectum.]
passe, v. surpass, 545 ; pass on, 173 ; passe over, pass on to something else, 496.
pasture, sb. act of feeding, 419.
pees, sb. peace, 669.
peyne, sb. pain, distress, 20, 588. • peyne, v. refl. take pains, exert (one's self), 539.
pitous, adj. arousing pity, 257.
plat, adv. flatly, bluntly, M. 767.
plesaunce, sb. pleasure, 100, 576.
pleye, v. amuse, be sportive, 40.
pleyne, v. lament, 587.
point, sb. detail, 256.
povre, adj. poor, 9.
powpe, v. toot (a horn), 633.

poynant, adj. (poignant), sharp-flavoured, 68.

preeve, sb. test of practice, 217 n.

present, adj. : lif present, present life, 215.

prive-ly, adv. secretly, 253.

propretee, sb. property, peculiar virtue, 186 n.

prow, sb. benefit, good, 184.

pryme, sb. nine a.m., 431. [Lat. prima (hora).] pyne, v. torture, 293.

quelle, v. kill, 624.

quod, 3 sg. pret. pres. quoth, 1, 251.

rad, pp. (of rede), read, 355, 546.

rage, sb. frenzy, 600.

real, adj. royal, regal, 410 n., 418.

recche, v. interpret, 130 n.

recche-lees, adj. disregardful, 341; thoughtless, 670.

reed, adj. red, 76.

regne, sb. kingdom, M. 774.

rekke, v. care, 48; pa.t. roghte, 574.

reme, sb. realm, 370. [OFr. reaume, realme; the spelling with l gains ground after Chaucer's day.]

remenant, sb. (the) rest, 138.

renne, v. run, 417; pa.t. pl. ronne, 622; pp. y-ronne, 428.

rente, sb. revenue, 61 n.

repaire, v. go frequently (to), resort (to), 454.

replecioun, sb. over-eating, 71; excess (of bodily humours), 157 n.

repleet, sb. full to excess, 191.

resonable, adj. equitable, 288.

rethor, sb. master of eloquence, 441. [Latin rhetor, Gk. ῥήτωρ.]

reulen, v. rule, govern, 278.

revel, sb. merriment, 437.

revers, sb. contrary, opposite, 211.

rewe, v. impers. : it reweth me, I am sorry for it, 331.

right, adv. just, 18, 167, 201, 299; right anon, immediately, 52, 292;

quite, 15; right ynough, quite enough, 2, 4.

roghte, pa.t. (of rekke) heeded, 574.

rome, v. walk leisurely, 132, 414.

[Not connected with Rome—the vowel is open ē not close ē.]

ronne, pa.t. pl. (of renne) ran, 622.

roore, v. utter a hoarse cry (of birds, &c.), 122.

sauf-ly, adv. safely, confidently, 442.

saugh, pa.t. (of se) saw, 133, 652.

say, pa.t. (of se), saw, 348.

sayn, v. say, 255. See seyn.

scole, sb. the schools, 471 n.

scorne, v. ridicule, 321 n.

se(e), v. see; pres. indic. pl. seen, 360; pa.t. saugh, 133; say, 348; pa.t. pl. syen, 612; pp. seyn, 515. [OE. sēon, pa.t. sg. seah, pl. sægōn.]

secre, adj. secret, discreet in talk, 149.

seinte, adj. holy; for seinte charitee, 554. (But there is a St. Charity.)

seken, v. seek, search, 370.

sely, adj. simple, humble, 609.

sentence, sb. opinion, thought, 211; matter, 36; subject, 448; meaning, 399; 'noble sentiments', 584 n.

sette, v. : sette nat a straw by, set not the value of a straw on, 324.

sewe, v. pursue, 571.

seyn, pp. seen, 515. See se(e).

seyn, v. say, tell; with dat. pron., 315, 342, 593; for to seyn, M. 764 n. See sayn.

seynd, adj. pp. (of senge to singe), broiled on coals? smoke-dried? 79.

shadde, pa.t. (of shede), poured, M. 741.

shal, pret. pres. shall, must, 183; shall(he), 328 n.; pl. shul, 184, 195; pa.t. sholde(n), 278, 376 n.

shal-tow = shalt thou, 252.

shente, pa.t. (of shende), injured, ruined, 75.

sherte, sb. shirt, 354.
 shill(e), adj. shrill, 629.
 sholde(n), see shal.
 shoon, pa.t. shone, 95.
 shot, sb. shooting; (a) missile (here an arrow), 583.
 shrewe, v. curse, 660, 661.
 shrighthe, pa.t. (of shriken) shrieked, 596. See skrike.
 shul, pret. pres. pl. (of shal) shall, 184, 193, 364. [OE. sculon pl.]
 significacioun, sb. sign, foretoking, 213.
 siker, adj. sure, 397; compar. sikerer, more trustworthy, 87. [OE. sicor < Lat. securus.] siker-ly, adv. surely, 28, 505.
 sith, conj. since, 329.
 sklendre, adj. slender, scanty, 67.
 skrike, v. shriek, 634 n.
 slayn, slawe, see slee.
 slee, v. slay; pa.t. slow, smote, M. 742; pp. slawe, 248; slayn, 256.
 smal, adj. slim, narrow, 139, 542.
 so, adv. (in adjurations), 22; so have I! so may I have . . . ! 300, 392; (forming an imperative), 679 n.
 sodeyn, adj. sudden, 7.
 sodeyn-ly, adv. suddenly, 438.
 solas, sb. solace, delight, 8, 404, 437.
 som-deel, adv. somewhat, 55.
 som-what, indef. pron. something, 27, 39.
 sondry, adj. (the) various, 370.
 song, soong, pa.t. sg. sang, 504, 537.
 sonne, sb. sun, 112.
 soond, sb. sand, 501. [ME. vowels before nd were normally long.]
 soong, pa.t. sang, 504. See song.
 soore, adv. sorely, 294; with distress, intensive, 583.
 sooth, sb. truth, 15, 255.
 sooth-fast-nesse, sb. truth, 562.
 sooth-ly, adv. truly, verily, 586.
 sorwe, sb. sorrow, 487 n.
 worwe-ful, adj. sad, 438.

soverayn, -eyn, adj. supreme, 443, 581. [OFr. soverein, Late Lat. superanus*.] sovereyn-ly, adv. above all others, 596.
 sper-hauke, sb. sparrow-hawk, Epi-logue (note to l. 43).
 sprynge, v. rise (of the sun), 112; grow (of flowers), 436.
 stape, adj. pp. (of steppe) advanced, 55 n.
 stente, v. cease, refrain (from), M. 745 n. See stynte. [OE. stytlan, ME. stinte, Kentish stente.]
 sterte, pa.t. start (up), 511; leap, 601. See stirte. [OE. styrtan, ME. stirte, Kentish sterte.] stevene, sb. voice, 431, 525.
 stikke, sb. stake, 82.
 stille, adj. lat. . . . be stille, leave alone, 677.
 stirte, v. jump (up), 568; rush, 611. See sterte.
 stonden, v. stand, 541.
 stoor, sb. store; telle no stoor of, set no store by, 388.
 strecche, v. stretch, 542.
 streit, adj. scanty, short, 223; streite swerd = drawn sword (?), 591 n.
 streemes, sb. streaming rays, M. 764.
 streyne, v. constrain, 478.
 stynte, v. cease, 391. See stente.
 substance, sb. material, stuff, 37 n.
 subtiltee, sb. cunning (trick), 553.
 suffsaunce, sb. contentment, 73.
 suffre, v. allow, permit, 580.
 superfluytee, sb. excess, 161.
 suspecious, sb. suspicion; fallen in s. to be suspicious, 266.
 sustres, sb. pl. sisters, 101, 502. [OE. sweastor, swustor; modern sister from ON. systir.] swerd, sb. sword, 591.
 sweven(e), sb. dream, M. 750, 155.
 swich, adj. and pron. such (a), 12 n., 62 n., 111 n.

syen, pa.t. pl. (of se) saw, 612.

syn, conj. since, 107, 424; syn that, since, 577.

t' = to : t'espye, to spy out, 522.

taak, imper. (of take), take, 177 n.

tale, sb. tale; tale tellen of, take account of, 352.

talk-ynge, sb. : swich t. such a discourse, 24.

tarie, v. tarry, wait, 304; delay, 181.

techen, v. direct, show the way (to), 183.

telle, v. reckon; ne telle . . . no stoor of, set no store by, 388; pp. toold, 352.

terciane, adj. fevere terciane, a fever increasing in violence every other day, 193 n.

thanne, adv. then, 92, 417.

that, demonstr. : by that God above, 143, 151.

that, rel. pron. who, which, that, 206, 301; see M. 741 f. n., 447 n.; pron. what, 2; that that, what, 20.

the, def. art. with names of materials: the jeet, jet, 95; the fyn coral, 93; the burned gold, 98; forming compound relative: the whiche, which, 186.

thee, v. thrive, prosper (in asseverations), 210 n., 666.

ther, adv. there: conj. where, M. 754, 239, 453; ther as, where, 236, 493.

ther-with-al, adv. besides, 327.

thilke = the ilke, that (same), 59, 90, 107.

this = this is, 291 n.

these, demonstr. pron. pl. these, 499; the, 34 n.

tho, pron. pl. those, M. 764, 185. [OE. þā pl. of def. art. sē.]

thogh, conj. though, 47.

thoughte v. impers., pa.t. (of thynken), it seemed, M. 753, 12 n.

thridde, num. adj. third, 247.

thritty, num. thirty, 424.

thurgh, prep. through, on account of, M. 748, 69.

thurgh-out, prep. through, 452.

thyng, sb. thing; pl. affairs, 323; see 12 n., 328 n.

thynketh (me), v. impers. it seems, 12 n. See thoughte.

tip-toon, sb. pl. tip-toes, 541.

to, adv. too, 159, 341.

to, prep. to; for (= Lat. ad), 676 n.

to-morwe, adv. to-morrow morning, 315; see note to 250.

to-nyght, adv. this night, 160.

tool, sb. weapon, 150.

toon or toos, sb. pl. toes, 96, 565.

torment, sb. anguish, 600.

torne, turne, v. turn (over) 244; change to the opposite, 637; t. agayn, return, 448, 608, 643.

towaille, sb. towel, M. 755.

traisoun, traysoun, sb. treachery, 351, 557.

trespas, sb. wrong, 654.

trewely, adv. truly, 356.

trone, sb. throne, M. 770. [OFr. trone; modern th is due to classical spelling, Lat. thronum.]

tweye, tweyn, num. two, 79, 139. [OE. masc. twēgen.]

twies, adv. twice, 246.

tyde, sb. time, 330, 338 n.

under-stonde, pp. understood, learned, 114.

under-take, v. give one's word, 445.

undren, sb. time up to noon, 456.

un-to, prep. in addition to, 280.

un-war, adj. unexpected, M. 774.

up, prep. upon; in asseverations: up peril . . . upon peril . . . 178 (cp. 'upon pain of death'. [OE. uppan, prep.; which in ME. coincides in form with the adverbs, OE. up, uppe.]

upon, prep.: make shoutes upon, raise hue and cry after, 631.

up-right, adv. face upwards, 276 n.